America's secretary of war, Pete Hegseth, said that a US Navy submarine sank an Iranian warship in the Indian Ocean. He called it America's first sinking of an enemy ship with a torpedo since the second world war. Earlier Sri Lankan officials said that the IRIS Dena was struck off the south Asian country's coast, and that around 140 people were missing.

Turkey's defence ministry said that NATO air-defence systems in the Mediterranean shot down an Iranian "ballistic munition" that was headed towards its air space. Debris from the missile interceptor landed in southern Turkey; no one was hurt. Iran is expanding its strikes against American allies across the region. Thus far Turkey has not allowed America to launch strikes from its territory.

Reports suggest that Mojtaba Khamenei, the 56-year-old son of the late Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has emerged as the frontrunner to become Iran's supreme leader. The country's Assembly of Experts, a group of 88 senior clerics, met on Tuesday to deliberate ahead of the former supreme leader's funeral. Israel's defence minister, Israel Katz, said that "any leader" chosen by the regime would become a "target for elimination".

Stockmarkets in Europe and America rose slightly on Wednesday, after those in Asia fell sharply. Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, was also relatively flat at around $81 per barrel, despite America's promises to protect shipping in the Strait of Hormuz. QatarEnergy, the world's largest maker of liquefied natural gas, declared force majeure, meaning it cannot fulfil contracts. It halted LNG production after Iranian attacks on its facilities.

Spain denied that it had agreed to cooperate with America over the use of its military bases, contradicting an earlier claim from the White House. On Tuesday Mr Trump threatened to sever trade ties with Spain after the country denied America's armed forces access to its bases. Spain's prime minister, Pedro Sánchez, has called America's war with Iran "illegal".

Vladimir Putin suggested that Russia might stop supplying Europe with natural gas in favour of "other markets" that are willing to pay more for it. The EU slashed imports of Russian gas in December, committing to end them by 2027. Russia's president said his government would deliberate on the issue, but that the country would continue supplying gas to Serbia, Hungary and Slovakia.

British police arrested three men on suspicion of spying for China. One suspect is the spouse of Joani Reid, a Labour MP; she denied knowledge of her husband's activities. Last year Britain's top prosecutor dropped a case against two other men accused of funnelling "politically sensitive information" to China. Critics have accused Sir Keir Starmer, Britain's prime minister, of being too soft on China.

Iran’s new power struggle

American and Israeli bombardment and an internet blackout make it difficult to read public opinion in Iran. The regime is still widely loathed. But as bombs fall dissent has retreated indoors. On Iran’s streets mourning for Ayatollah Ali Khamenei—killed on Saturday—has eclipsed grief for the thousands of protesters slain in January at his command.

A worn-out regime has found renewed purpose under fire. Anti-Americanism and anti-Zionism, which had become threadbare ideologies, have gained fresh force. The restraints that Khamenei placed on Iran’s armed forces are off. And political hardliners, emboldened by war, appear to have replaced reformists in the struggle to name Khamenei’s successor as supreme leader. Talk of a managed transition—or of repairing the rupture with America that has defined the regime since 1979—has faded. Reports suggest the leading contender is Khamenei’s son, Mojtaba Khamenei, who has close ties to the regime’s security apparatus.

An unfolding energy nightmare

Energy analysts modelling a war involving Iran have long feared two developments: the Islamic Republic lashing out at its oil-rich neighbours and a blockade of the Strait of Hormuz, through which a third of global seaborne crude and a fifth of liquefied natural gas transit daily.

Now both are happening at once. Iran has struck energy facilities in Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates. The Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, Iran's praetorian guard, have declared Hormuz closed and vessels have been hit. As a result, energy prices are catching fire. Iraq is running out of storage for its stranded oil and cutting output; Kuwait may follow. Asian buyers are already turning elsewhere to replace the oil and gas they no longer get from the Gulf, pushing up prices for everyone. It is unclear whether Donald Trump's promise of insurance and naval escorts for tankers in the Gulf will do much to get oil flowing again. The economic consequences of the energy shock could be far-reaching.

How the Iran war hurts Ukraine

Ukraine’s president, Volodymyr Zelensky, expects trilateral talks with America and Russia to go ahead this week despite the outbreak of war in the Middle East. Iran’s regime is an ally of the Kremlin and has supplied drone technology to Russia’s armed forces. But the war could have negative consequences for Ukraine. Higher oil prices will bring some relief to Russia’s hard-pressed economy. And the need for American air-defence interceptors by Israel and America’s Gulf allies will mean that fewer are available for Ukraine.

Even so, things are going a bit better for Ukraine on the battlefield. The head of its armed forces, Oleksandr Syrsky, claims that his troops retook more territory in February than Russia captured. The coming of spring should bring some relief to civilians whom Russia has tried to freeze into submission through relentless strikes on Ukraine’s power grid. Progress at the talks, however, is highly unlikely.

China’s rubber-stamp parliament convenes

This week China’s “two sessions”, the annual meeting of its legislature, the National People’s Congress, and that of its advisory body, kick off in Beijing. Li Qiang, the prime minister, will set out the country’s goals for the coming year to 2,900-odd delegates at the NPC on Thursday. He may trim China’s annual GDP growth target from “around 5%” (as it has been for the past three years) to 4.5-5%, amid a lingering property slump.

China’s next five-year plan, which will cover the period from 2026 to 2030, will also be released during the NPC session, which usually lasts around a week, for delegates to give their approval. It will set out guidance for officials on everything under the sun, from encouraging China’s cautious consumers to spend more, to boosting birth rates. But the focus will be achieving self-sufficiency in technologies where it still relies on foreign equipment or know-how, such as semiconductors and aircraft engines.
