Shares in Nvidia ended flat in after-hours trading, despite the artificial-intelligence pioneer reporting strong earnings and projected sales of $78bn for the current quarter. That was above analysts' estimates of about $72bn. For months investors have worried about firms pouring too much money into AI. Jensen Huang, Nvidia's boss, insisted that companies' "adoption of [AI] agents is skyrocketing."

Volodymyr Zelensky said he had spoken to Donald Trump ahead of a meeting between America and Ukraine in Geneva on Thursday. Ukraine's president said that the past winter, during which Russia repeatedly bombed energy infrastructure, had been the country's "most difficult". Even so, on the front line Russia barely advanced. Its movement towards peace appears to be equally glacial.

Canadian ministers summoned executives from OpenAI and ordered the firm to rapidly improve its safety controls or else face new legislation. The maker of ChatGPT did not alert police when it banned an account last year belonging to Jesse Van Rootselaar, an 18-year-old suspected of killing eight people and herself on February 10th. OpenAI said the her violations of its rules did not meet its criteria for reporting to police.

America's secretary of state, Marco Rubio, said his country would investigate Cuba's attack on a Florida-registered speedboat. Cuban officials claimed their forces shot and killed four people and injured six after they entered Cuban waters and fired on border troops. They said those killed were Cuban nationals living in America. The Trump administration has been tightening the screws on the island nation's government.

Hong Kong's main stock-exchange operator reported record profits of HK$17.8bn ($2.3bn) for 2025. The city has re-established itself as a hub for investors, a role it had lost in part because of its strict covid-19 lockdowns. Companies that have listed on the exchange this year include Eastroc Beverage, an energy-drink maker, and Muyuan, a pork producer.

Borge Brende, the chief executive of the World Economic Forum, which organises the Davos meetings, resigned after it launched an investigation into his ties to Jeffrey Epstein. Files released by America's Justice Department suggested that Mr Brende, a Norwegian, attended dinners with him. He has denied knowledge of Epstein's crimes. Several business leaders have stepped down over similar links to Epstein.

Denmark's prime minister, Mette Frederiksen, called a parliamentary election to be held on March 24th. Support for Ms Frederiksen surged after she stood up to Donald Trump's recent threats to annex Greenland, an autonomous Danish territory. Still, concerns over the economy and her government's efforts to boost defence spending could weigh on support for her Social Democratic Party.

The Clintons' date with Congress

Bill and Hillary Clinton are headed to Capitol Hill. After months of stalling, the Clintons will answer a congressional committee's questions about their ties to Jeffrey Epstein, a dead sex offender. Mrs Clinton, who was Barack Obama's secretary of state, will testify in a closed-door deposition on Thursday. When Mr Clinton follows on Friday, he will become the first former president to testify before a congressional panel since 1983.

Neither has been accused of wrongdoing by Epstein's victims—and they deny any knowledge of his misdeeds. The Clintons' lawyer claims that the committee, which is led by Republicans, is creating "a public spectacle for partisan purposes". Mrs Clinton accuses the Justice Department of "slow-walking" the release of files related to Epstein; she maintains that the Trump administration is engaged in a "cover-up". Expect finger-pointing from all sides, but few revelations.

Last chance for America and Iran

The window for diplomacy is closing. Officials from America and Iran will meet in Geneva on Thursday for a third round of negotiations aimed at preventing a war. The meeting comes as a second American aircraft-carrier is deployed near the Middle East. Satellite images show that many of the American warships usually docked in Bahrain are now out at sea. Donald Trump has promised to attack Iran if it does not negotiate a deal—though his objectives remain unclear.

Abbas Araghchi, Iran's foreign minister, will probably offer concessions on the country's uranium-enrichment programme. Some of Mr Trump's Republican allies want to avoid a deal that boosts Iran's embattled regime. So does Israel. Mr Trump made scant mention of Iran during his state-of-the-union address this week. He said Iran could avoid conflict if it promised not to build a bomb. But Iranian officials have offered similar assurances in the past; repackaging old rhetoric would hardly represent a breakthrough.

A test in Manchester for Britain's government

Manchester will be the talk of Westminster on Thursday. Residents of Gorton and Denton, in the city's south-east, are voting to replace Andrew Gwynne, a Labour MP who resigned in January. It should be a safe Labour seat. The constituency had the 38th-largest Labour majority in 2024. Gorton, part of inner Manchester, has a young population and a large group of Muslim voters. Denton, a suburb, is mainly white and working class.

Yet the Labour government's unpopularity opens up opportunities for rivals. Reform UK and the Green Party are pouring resources into the constituency. Opinion polls indicate that all three parties stand a chance. The by-election is especially risky for the prime minister, Sir Keir Starmer, who prevented Andy Burnham, the Greater Manchester mayor and a potential rival to lead the party, from standing as the Labour candidate. A Labour loss in Gorton and Denton would be bad for Sir Keir; a victory by Mr Burnham might have threatened him more.

Baidu takes the wheel

Baidu, a Chinese search-engine giant, has a bad reputation at home. Many young Chinese blame it for turning the national internet into an ad-clogged cesspool. They ridicule its apps, which they say are unusable. Although Baidu was the first company to release a Chinese large language model for consumer use, called Ernie, it lags behind those created by competitors such as Alibaba, Tencent and ByteDance, the owner of TikTok.

Yet the picture is not entirely bleak. Baidu's driverless-taxi service, Apollo Go, has been pushing aggressively into foreign countries, most recently Dubai (in partnership with Uber, an American ride-hailing firm). It is also eyeing launches in Britain and Germany (with Lyft, another ride-hailing app) this year. When Baidu reports its full-year results on Thursday, investors will look for signs that China's search-engine titan is now a robotaxi champion-in-waiting.
