America's war secretary implored Iran's leaders to make a deal with Donald Trump. Pete Hegseth said America considered Iran to have a "new regime" during a press conference. (In reality Iranian security forces have only tightened their grip on power.) Meanwhile, Mr Trump lashed out at allies on social media, singling out Britain, which should "fight for yourself" and "get your own oil".

America's Supreme Court ruled that Colorado cannot ban "conversion therapy" for patients under 18. The decision could have implications for more than other 20 states that prevent therapists from seeking to change the sexual orientation or gender identity of minors. Defending the eight-to-one decision, Justice Neil Gorsuch wrote that "the First Amendment stands as a shield against any effort to enforce orthodoxy".

Japan deployed long-range missiles for the first time. The land-to-ship rockets, which have a range of 1,000 kilometres—enough to hit targets as far as China—will be based at a military camp in Kumamoto in the south-west. Japan is expanding its offensive capabilities under its new government to increase deterrence against its increasingly aggressive neighbours, China and North Korea.

Willie Walsh was appointed the boss of IndiGo, India's biggest airline. The former British Airways CEO will take over from Pieter Elbers, who resigned three months ago over the carrier's operational meltdown. At the peak of the problem in December the airline cancelled more than half its roughly 2,300 daily flights because of poor planning, sparking a national crisis.

Unilever, a consumer goods conglomerate, agreed to combine its food division with McCormick & Company, a spice and seasoning giant. The deal puts the value of Unilever's food unit, which makes Marmite and Hellmann's mayonnaise, at $44.8bn. Last year the company spun off its ice-cream unit, which makes Ben & Jerry's and Magnum, shifting its focus to its beauty, personal care and home brands.

Donald Trump's net approval rating has sunk to -20, according to The Economist's tracker. That is the lowest it has been during his second term. The Iran war is probably responsible. Only 28% of them support the war, while 59% oppose it. And it has driven the price of oil up, with knock-on impacts on prices. And inflation is the issue which voters care about more than any other.

The longest-running international music competition is coming to Asia. Eurovision will once again foray abroad (it held an unsuccessful American Song Contest in 2022) with the final taking place in Thailand's capital, Bangkok, in November. Ten countries have already said they will participate, including South Korea, Bhutan and the Philippines. Last year 163m people watched the original version of the kitsch and often politically contentious song contest.

Will the Iran war turn into a ground invasion?

“Maybe we take Kharg Island, maybe we don’t,” Donald Trump said on Sunday. America has threatened to make the wedge of land in the Gulf that Iran uses to export 90% of its oil the site of a possible ground invasion. Could America put boots on the ground? A unit of several thousand Marines is already in the Middle East, and another unit left California on March 18th, but is unlikely to arrive for two weeks or so. A further 2,000 troops from the 82nd airborne division reportedly began arriving in the region over the weekend.

Invading Kharg Island could stymie Iran’s lucrative oil exports, but the possible costs to America are steep: even higher petrol prices and military casualties. If American troops go in, limited raids inland that target launchers and storage sites may be more likely than the seizure of territory. Mr Trump will consider the political risk; Iran’s leaders have no midterm elections to worry about.

Iran’s oil empire

Unlike its neighbours Iran earns nearly twice as much from oil sales each day as it did before the war. A source told The Economist the country is exporting 2.4m-2.8m barrels of oil and petroleum products per day, over half of which is crude—the same, or more, than on average last year, but at much higher prices. Almost all of it flows through Kharg Island.

China absorbs more than 90% of Iran’s oil, mostly through 100-odd small “teapot” refineries, which are in theory independent of state-owned giants (the reality is murkier). Most of the proceeds go through a shadow-payment system of shell companies and accounts linked to Iran, ultimately benefiting the regime. Iranian officials appear to be preparing to defend Kharg, and are building up stocks at their smaller terminals. But these would only handle roughly a quarter of Iran’s current oil exports, should Kharg be taken out.

Emmanuel Macron jets off to Japan

The French president arrives in Japan on Tuesday, for his fourth official trip. Emmanuel Macron is bringing a planeload of French business chiefs, including bosses from AI, quantum and space startups. Yet the geopolitical crisis in the Gulf will probably dominate the visit.

Japan relies heavily on oil imports that pass through the Strait of Hormuz, now largely blocked. The country, with Canada, France and others, has agreed on a “readiness to contribute” to efforts to ensure safe passage through the strait (though not to unblock it).

Japan also belongs to the “coalition of the willing”, a Franco-British attempt to plan for Ukraine’s post-war security. In preparation for the G7 meeting in France in June, Mr Macron is expected to seek the support of Takaichi Sanae, Japan’s prime minister, in correcting “global economic imbalances” that benefit China in particular. Mr Macron’s visit may have a Japanese flavour—he will call on the Imperial Palace in addition to a summit in Tokyo—but the agenda will be decidedly global.

The Philippines' flood-control fiasco

Torrential downpours are common in the Philippines. But the disaster-prone nation is now weathering a different kind of storm: a corruption scandal over hundreds of millions of dollars in stolen funds intended for flood-control projects. On Tuesday a commission carrying out a probe into the embezzlement dissolves. Its findings implicate members of congress, civil servants and contractors accused of pocketing funds earmarked for projects that either failed or were never finished (or even started).

President Ferdinand "Bongbong" Marcos, who ordered the investigation, claims credit for exposing the scandal. The son of the late president, Ferdinand Marcos senior, he is eager to restore his family's reputation, which was tarnished by the corruption that flourished under his despotic father. But until prominent figures are convicted and sentenced, sceptics will remain unconvinced that any politician belonging to the Marcos clan—past, present or future—can break the cycle of graft.

Are India’s Maoists done?

By Tuesday, India will be free of the world’s longest-running Maoist insurgency—at least according to a promise made by Amit Shah, the country’s home minister. In reality, there will still be Maoists milling about Indian jungles. Yet India is indeed on the cusp of dismantling the so-called Naxalite movement, which has plagued the country since 1967.

Once considered India’s greatest internal security threat, the guerrilla group had around 20,000 fighters across more than 200 districts in the late 2000s. Today it is active in just seven districts. With almost the entire central committee gone, morale has collapsed and footsoldiers have surrendered in droves. The induction of tribal groups—who have long made up the majority of Maoist forces—into India’s security forces has provided invaluable intelligence on the movement.

But the troubles that fuelled it remain. Locals worry that the crackdown on insurgents is a precursor for mining giants to seize mineral-rich tribal lands, continuing a cycle of mass displacements.
