Buckingham Palace said a state visit by King Charles and Queen Camilla to America will go ahead on Monday, despite security worries after a shooting at the White House Correspondents' Association dinner on Saturday. In an interview Donald Trump claimed the gunman, who was arrested, had "a manifesto" and "hates Christians". Everyone at the dinner was safely evacuated.

Mr Trump said in an interview that if Iran's leaders wanted to make a deal they only had to call. On Sunday Abbas Araghchi, Iran's foreign minister, returned to Islamabad for the second time in several days to continue talks with the Pakistani government, which is trying to mediate. On Saturday Mr Trump cancelled the trip of Steve Witkoff and Jared Kushner, two of his envoys, to Pakistan.

Sabastian Sawe became the first person to run a sub-two-hour marathon in race conditions. The 31-year-old Kenyan completed the London marathon in one hour, 59 minutes and 30 seconds. Yomif Kejelcha, an Ethiopian who came second, also finished in under two hours. In 2019 Eliud Kipchoge, another Kenyan, achieved the same feat, but because he used a team of pacemakers the record was not official.

Thom Tillis, a Republican member of the Senate banking committee, said he would support Kevin Warsh's appointment as chair of the Federal Reserve. Mr Tillis had threatened to block Mr Warsh's nomination while the Department of Justice continued its spurious investigation into Jerome Powell, the outgoing chair. Mr Tillis saw it as a threat to the central bank's independence. The DoJ abandoned its probe on Friday.

China issued its first set of rules for companies employing gig workers such as delivery riders. Regulation for the gig economy was previously piecemeal, meaning workers were easily exploited. By 2027 the government aims to have policies in place that include standardised labour protections and pay. Officials will now also have more oversight of the algorithms and systems used by e-commerce giants like Alibaba and JD.com.

Viktor Orban, the former prime minister of Hungary, said he would not take his seat in parliament when it reconvenes on May 9th. Mr Orban's Fidesz party suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the country's new leader, Peter Magyar, and his Tisza party earlier this month. "I am now needed not in parliament, but in the reorganisation of the patriotic movement," he said in a Facebook video.

Russia fired 47 missiles and more than 600 drones at Ukraine overnight. Ukraine said it had intercepted most of these, though at least seven people were killed, including five in the city of Dnipro. "Most targets are civilian infrastructure in cities," noted the Ukrainian president, Volodymyr Zelensky, on social media. Meanwhile a Ukrainian drone hit an apartment building in the city of Yekaterinburg, nearly 1,600km from the border.

Word of the week: Kriegstüchtig, a term for "war-ready", coined by Boris Pistorius, Germany's defence minister. Read more about how the country's armed forces are getting battle-ready.

A pause for now

Donald Trump’s announcement on April 23rd that the ten-day ceasefire between Israel and Hizbullah, an Iran-backed militia in Lebanon, would be extended by three weeks brought only limited relief. The ceasefire paused large-scale air strikes by Israel and missile and drone attacks by Hizbullah on towns in Lebanon and Israel. But both sides have continued to clash in southern Lebanon, where Israel maintains a “security zone”. Many Lebanese civilians are still prevented from returning to their homes and Israeli forces have levelled several villages near the border.

It will be hard to agree security arrangements within Lebanon. The Lebanese government remains powerless to rein in and disarm Hizbullah, and Israel is reluctant to withdraw from the area it has occupied until that happens. Mr Trump, who convened Israeli and Lebanese diplomats for talks, promised to “work with Lebanon in order to help it protect itself from Hizbullah”. But he has yet to come up with a lasting solution.

Legacy of a disaster

Forty years ago today, a safety test at the Chernobyl nuclear-power plant in Ukraine went badly wrong. Thirty-one people died in the immediate explosion or from radiation sickness shortly after; the long-run death toll has been estimated at 15,000. The details of the accident and ensuing cover-up revealed the rot of the Soviet Union's bootlicking bureaucracy to its people, and to Mikhail Gorbachev, then the president. The disaster came to be seen as marking the beginning of the union's end.

What is Chernobyl's legacy? Scientists are still working to track the radioactive particles the accident released and to find ways to remediate the environment; this would provide valuable data for future accidents. And the exclusion zone around the plant has become a celebrated experiment in rewilding. Animals have flourished. But in 2022 the pastoral peace was broken: Russians occupied and ransacked the plant on the day they invaded Ukraine.

The limits of Takaichi's power

At first glance Japan's prime minister looks like one of her country's most commanding leaders in a generation. In February Takaichi Sanae led her Liberal Democratic Party to its biggest election victory. But six months into office, her grip may be weakening.

Ms Takaichi remains popular among voters. Her party, less so. Its reputation has been tainted by a series of scandals. While the cabinet's approval rating stands at around 65%, the LDP's languishes at around 35%. On April 19th, the party lost seven out of 13 local elections. It faces another batch on Sunday.

The Iran war presents new risks for her. Japan imports over 90% of its crude oil through the Strait of Hormuz. So far, government petrol subsidies have absorbed much of the shock. Yet the subsidy fund, which holds over ¥1trn ($6.3bn), could run dry within two months at current spending rates. If inflation soars, the political cost could be high.

Pop go the measles?

For more than six months, South Carolina has been afflicted by one of the worst measles outbreaks in America in recent years. Nearly 1,000 cases have been reported since September. On Sunday the state is expected to declare its end. As with other big outbreaks, cases were clustered in one county with particularly low vaccination rates. These are typically tight-knit religious or immigrant communities with entrenched anti-vaccine attitudes. But not always. In the 2022-24 school years two-thirds of counties in America had measles vaccination rates below the 95% threshold needed to prevent an outbreak. In most counties vaccination rates had dropped since the 2017-2020 school years.

More outbreaks are therefore expected. A single infected person traveling to an undervaccinated county can start one. If new cases linked to an outbreak keep popping up for more than a year, America will lose its measles “elimination” status under the World Health Organisation—an indictment on its public health system.

A piano superstar's school concert

In 2022, at 18, Lim Yun-chan became the youngest-ever winner of the Van Cliburn piano competition (his performance of Sergei Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3" made the conductor weep). His recording of the "Goldberg Variations", by Johann Sebastian Bach, is currently top of Apple's classical-music chart. Yet Mr Lim is still a student. On Sunday he will play a recital in Boston to get his diploma.

Mr Lim would not look out of place in a boy band, and in his native South Korea his first album (of Chopin's Études) charted just behind the number one, by BoyNextDoor, a K-pop group. He says he lives "only for the sake of music". At the New England Conservatory Mr Lim will be playing for free to 1,000 people. The tickets, naturally, are gone. But another chance to hear him perform comes on July 17th, at the opening concert of the BBC Proms in London, which will be televised.
