Chuck Schumer, the Democratic Senate majority leader and America's highest-ranking Jewish politician, called on Israel to hold fresh elections. Mr Schumer said that the government of Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, tolerates too many civilian deaths in Gaza and "no longer fits the needs of Israel". He added that the country "cannot survive if it becomes a pariah". President Joe Biden is also exasperated with Mr Netanyahu—who he recently said was "hurting Israel more than helping" it—but has not called for Israel's leader to be replaced.

Joe Biden said he opposed a proposed takeover of US Steel by Nippon Steel. In December Japan's biggest steelmaker agreed to buy the American company in a deal worth nearly $15bn. But the agreement met fierce criticism from unions and politicians, partly on national-security grounds. Donald Trump, Mr Biden's rival in the presidential election, has said he would "block it instantaneously".

The prosecutors trying one of Donald Trump's cases—in which he is accused of falsifying documents—said they were open to delaying the trial by 30 days. Alvin Bragg, the New York district attorney, said that, after receiving a late batch of documents, his office would not oppose Mr Trump's efforts to push back the trial, scheduled to start on March 25th. (Mr Trump denies wrongdoing.)

SpaceX, a firm founded by Elon Musk, launched its vast Starship rocket from its base in Texas. The test appears to have been more successful than two missions carried out last year. The two-stage rocket completed its separation manoeuvre and entered space.

SpaceX said it lost contact with the rocket on re-entry into the atmosphere. It was supposed to splashdown in the Indian Ocean.

The International Energy Agency revised its forecast for global oil-demand growth to 1.3m barrels a day in 2024. That is an increase of 110,000 b/d compared with a forecast last month, but well below 2.3m b/d in 2023. The world's energy watchdog also lowered its forecast on global supply growth as OPEC+ countries cut production.

France's lower house of parliament approved a draft law that sets limitations on fast-fashion companies. The legislation would impose an environmental charge on cheap garments and make it difficult for brands to advertise. If it passes the Senate, the law—claimed to be a world first—could cause headaches for firms such as Shein and Temu.

On Wednesday the British government introduced legislation to stop the Telegraph and the Spectator being controlled by a foreign state. The Economist has investigated Sir Frederick and Sir David Barclay, the twin brothers who bought the titles in 2004, and how their business escaped bankruptcy in the 1970s. As debate rages about who should own the news media, our investigation asks whether the brothers' empire was built on a fraud.

NATO’s secretary-general steps down

After ten years in the job Jens Stoltenberg, NATO’s secretary-general, will deliver his final annual report on Thursday. He leaves the military alliance in good shape. But it is facing great challenges. Because of Vladimir Putin’s aggression against Ukraine, NATO has rediscovered its role as the bastion of European territorial defence against Russia.

Last week, Sweden joined Finland as a new NATO member. Both countries bring sophisticated military capabilities to defending NATO’s border in the Baltics and in the high north. Roughly two-thirds of NATO’s 32 members are on track this year to reach or exceed the target of spending 2% of GDP on defence. And the alliance is currently conducting its biggest exercise since the cold war, involving 90,000 troops.

But the failure to deliver sufficient munitions to Ukraine has allowed Russia, for now, to take the advantage in the war. Perhaps most worrying is the possibility of NATO-hating Donald Trump returning to the White House and effectively taking America out of the alliance.

Foxconn’s next chapter

Foxconn, one of the largest electronics manufacturers in the world, is often regarded as a gauge of economic activity in China, where its largest factories are located. Some analysts also look to its production lines for a sense of how Apple, the American technology giant, is performing. Foxconn’s factories churn out more iPhones than any other company’s. But the Taiwanese group, which just celebrated its 50th anniversary, is trying to shift what it makes and where it makes it.

Analysts therefore watched Foxconn’s fourth-quarter results, released on Thursday, closely. They were looking for a sense of the company’s direction as it moves beyond making phones in China. The signs were good: Foxconn announced profits of $1.6bn between October and December, marking its second consecutive quarter of growth. This suggests that the group’s recent moves—including investing in America and India, and producing more electric vehicles—are paying off. But those changes will, in turn, change how the company copes with the complicated politics of Taiwanese-Chinese-American relations.

Spain’s amnesty for Catalan separatists

On Thursday the lower house of Spain’s parliament approved an amnesty for those involved in an illegal referendum in 2017 held in a failed push for Catalan independence.

The issue has consumed Spain since last summer. Pedro Sánchez, the prime minister, fell short of a majority in an election in July. To secure the votes of Catalan separatists in parliament he proposed an amnesty. Mr Sánchez had previously called the issue unconstitutional—after Thursday's vote, though, a member of his Socialist Party welcomed "a time for reconciliation". The leader of the Conservative opposition, meanwhile, called it "submission" to the separatists. The spokeswoman of one separatist party said (as the two main groupings have all along) that "the goal remains independence."

In a twist, on the eve of the vote, the current leader of Catalonia, Pere Aragonès, called snap regional elections for May. The amnesty may allow his rival, Carles Puigdemont, to compete from exile—and perhaps even return as Catalan president.

How global shipping is faring

Globalisation's middlemen have had a testing time. Low waters stalled freighters trying to pass through the Panama Canal. Attacks by the Houthis, an Iran-backed Yemeni militia, on ships in the Red Sea shook global trade. The IMF reports that volumes shipped via the Suez Canal—which normally serves around 15% of maritime trade—fell by half in January and February compared with a year earlier. Most have been redirected around southern Africa.

But DP World's full year results for 2023, released on Thursday, gave an early indication that global trade is holding up—for now. The state-owned Emirati firm, which operates ports in roughly 40 countries, reported that its revenues increased by 6.6% year on year but that profits fell because of higher costs. In January its boss, Sultan Ahmed bin Sulayem, seemed unconcerned about the Houthis' attacks. "I don't see this going on long term," he said. Two months later the Red Sea shows no sign of returning to normal. Commenting on his company's earnings, Mr bin Sulayem offered a more pragmatic view of the "deteriorating geopolitical landscape". Commerce is adapting, but it is a struggle.

Why golfers are feeling flush

Since the launch of the Saudi-funded LIV Tour two years ago, men's golf has been soaked in money. LIV offered enormous salaries to some of the world's best players to persuade them to defect from America's prestigious PGA Tour. Those offers continue to lure them: Tyrrell Hatton, an English player, moved to LIV in January for a reported sum of at least $60m.

The PGA Tour responded by jacking up the prize money at its own events. This year's Players Championship at Sawgrass in Florida, which begins on Thursday, carries a total purse of $25m, making it more lucrative than any of the four majors. The tour also accepted a $3bn investment from Strategic Sports Group, an American consortium, creating a new commercial entity. Crucially, to encourage their loyalty players will get equity stakes in this venture. Golfers are already among the best-paid athletes on the planet. They are about to get richer still.
