Leo Varadkar, Ireland's prime minister, acknowledged defeat in a two-part referendum about modernising the constitution. His government, with the support of other parties, had sought to expand the constitutional definition of families to include "durable relationships". And it wanted to change a reference to a mother's "duties in the home" to one about family-based care. The results will disappoint those who have welcomed the wave of liberalisation that has washed over the country in recent years, on matters including divorce and abortion.

Joe Biden signed a $460bn package of spending bills into law just in time to prevent a partial government shutdown. The six bills, which were passed by the Senate on Friday, fund various government departments, including housing and transport, until the end of September. The work is not yet done, though. The deadline for passing six more such bills, which include funding for defence, is March 22nd.

Preparations intensified for the first naval dispatch of aid to Gaza from Cyprus. A ship is expected to set sail this weekend to deliver desperately needed aid to the Palestinian enclave, opening a long-trailed humanitarian corridor. The vessel will drag a barge containing 200 tonnes of food provided by an American charity, although details about docking and distribution remain unclear. Meanwhile, America said it would take 60 days to build a pier designed to receive aid shipments off Gaza's coast. America has been air-dropping food in the territory since March 2nd, a move that has been criticised as inefficient and dangerous.

Asif Ali Zardari was voted president of Pakistan by the country's parliamentarians. He was supported by the Pakistan Peoples Party and the Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz, two parties that formed a coalition government after last month's controversial general election. Mr Zardari's term, which begins on Sunday, will be his second. His first, from 2008 to 2013, took place in the aftermath of the assassination of his wife, Benazir Bhutto, Pakistan's first female prime minister.

America and its allies claimed to have shot down 28 drones launched by the Houthis, a rebel group that controls a large swathe of Yemen, against shipping in the Red Sea. The attack is one of the largest yet launched by the group since it began menacing merchant shipping in November. America and its allies have been patrolling the waterways to deter attacks on commercial shipping. But on Wednesday three people were killed in a Houthi attack on a Liberian-registered vessel.

Gangs in Haiti attacked several government buildings, including the presidential palace, in Port-au-Prince, the capital. The gangs are demanding the resignation of the unpopular prime minister, Ariel Henry, who has not returned to the country since travelling to Kenya last week. Guy Philippe, a former police chief who led a coup in 2004, made a claim for the presidency and told Mr Henry to step down.

Ukrainian drones struck Kursk and Rostov, two Russian regions that adjoin Ukraine's eastern border, according to the local governors. The attacks typify Ukraine's growing willingness to strike back in response to Russia's myriad drone launches on its territory. In early January Russia said it intercepted 36 over Crimea. Ukraine's government has said it hopes to make 10,000 long-range drones in 2024.

China's inflation mirage

China's "monetary-policy toolbox is still rich", said Pan Gongsheng, the governor of China's central bank, at a press conference this week. That is the sort of thing you say when people suspect the opposite. Consumer prices in China fell year-on-year for four months in a row from October to January. To fight deflation, central banks typically cut interest rates sharply. But Mr Pan's room for manoeuvre is limited because he does not want to overly weaken China's currency or squeeze the profits of China's banks.

Figures released on Saturday showed inflation turning positive in February: consumer prices rose by 0.7% compared with a year earlier. But Mr Pan cannot take too much comfort. The data may be distorted by the Spring Festival holiday, when people rushed home to their families to celebrate a new lunar year. The price of recreational travel, for example, rose by 23.1% year-on-year. When this holiday effect dissipates, Mr Pan may have to rummage through his rich toolbox again.

The rise of Asian concert diplomacy

As Taylor Swift ends the Asian leg of her Eras tour in Singapore on Saturday, she leaves a trail of grumbling politicians in her wake. After wondering why Ms Swift had not announced any dates in Thailand, Srettha Thavisin, the country's prime minister, said he discovered an exclusivity deal between the superstar and Singapore's government. Swifties across South-East Asia were outraged. One lawmaker from the Philippines, arguably home to the region's largest fanbase, chided Singapore's unneighbourly behaviour.

Notwithstanding the bad blood, the city-state is advantageous for stars like Ms Swift. It has excellent infrastructure, political stability and strong rule of law. The Brazil leg of the Eras tour in November, by contrast, was marred by two deaths, reports of muggings, a stampede and excessive heat. Yet leaders are eager for the billions in economic value that Ms Swift's concerts reportedly generate.

With Thailand pledging to court A-list performers with their own special deals, and calls for Hong Kong to do the same, competition for Asian concert supremacy will only ramp up.

Baseball against the odds in Cuba

Cuba's national baseball competition starts its 63rd season on Saturday. That the 75-game, 16-team series is going ahead at all is testimony to the sport's popularity among the island's 11.2m people and the big diaspora in the United States. In February the Cuban authorities announced a ban on all sporting events, citing fuel shortages that would prevent players and fans from travelling. An exception appears to have been quietly made for the tournament.

The fuel scarcity is part of a severe economic crisis that stems from years of mismanagement under Communist rule. Local industry is sputtering and the government lacks the foreign reserves to import goods from abroad; there is even a shortage of bread. These dire conditions will cast a shadow over the contest: the authorities have told areas hosting the series to look for sponsors to cover the costs of basic equipment including balls and bats. Still, baseball-mad Cubans will welcome any light relief.

Jack Antonoff’s own sound

Jack Antonoff is one of contemporary music’s biggest hitmakers. He has written or co-written songs with Lana del Rey, Lorde and Troye Sivan; he has produced albums by Diana Ross and St Vincent. In recent years he has become Taylor Swift’s go-to collaborator; she has described him as “so talented it’s incomprehensible”. His work on her blockbuster albums “Folklore”, “Evermore” and “Midnights” helped him win the Grammy for Producer of the Year (Non-Classical) in 2022, 2023 and 2024—making him only the second person to win the prize in three consecutive years.

This weekend Mr Antonoff released “Bleachers”, by his rock band of the same name. The record shows off the “Antonoff Sound”, with its trademark grandiose choruses and bridges, as well as 1980s-style synth and punchy guitars. The record contains some catchy tunes (“Tiny Moves”) and throwbacks (“Modern Girl”), but never quite recreates the magic of Mr Antonoff’s work with other artists. Call it musical altruism.

Jensen Huang, shovel-maker for the AI gold rush

Jensen Huang is a paranoid man. The boss of Nvidia, an American chip designer, is fond of saying that his company is always “30 days away from going out of business”. Recent developments, however, are making a mockery of such talk. Thanks to an artificial-intelligence (AI) boom, Nvidia is now America’s third-most valuable firm. Its market capitalisation of $2.2trn is only exceeded by Microsoft and Apple.

Mr Huang’s paranoia can be traced back to his roots. After his family moved from Taiwan to America he was sent to a Baptist school for troubled youths. There, he shared a room with a knife-scarred boy. That did little to distract him from academic success: he sped through high school, graduating at 16. In 1993, aged 30 and armed with two degrees in electrical engineering, he founded Nvidia with two other engineers. The start-up had to compete in a cut-throat semiconductor market dominated by heavyweights like Intel, then the world’s biggest chipmaker.

Beyond paranoia, two further traits explain how Mr Huang has propelled Nvidia to success. The first is a focus on the long term.

He realised early on that simply making fast chips was not enough: customers also needed help in tailoring them for their specific needs. In the mid 2000s he started investing in “CUDA”, a software platform that enables Nvidia’s customers to make the most of its chips. Many saw software development as a costly distraction for a chip company. But today CUDA is one of the company’s strongest defences against competitors.

The second is Mr Huang’s propensity for bold bets. Almost a decade ago he realised that Nvidia’s graphics-processor units, which were originally built for video-game consoles, also worked well for training AI models. Mr Huang shifted his company’s resources towards building chips for AI applications, long before the current boom in large language models. In 2017 he surprised investors by saying that the company’s transition to AI could “work out great, or terribly” since the firm was “all in”. Even for Mr Huang, great would be an understatement.
