The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: AFP

Donald Trump said a second round of talks between America and Iran could take place “over the next two days” in Pakistan. The president, who was speaking to the New York Post, did not provide any more details. Meanwhile the Pentagon said that no ships had passed its blockade in the Strait of Hormuz, and that six merchant vessels had turned back to Iranian ports on its instruction.

America said that Israel and Lebanon had agreed to “launch direct negotiations” following trilateral talks in Washington. Israel’s ambassador to America said that Israel and Lebanon were “united in liberating Lebanon” from Hizbullah. The Iran-backed militia has made thinly veiled threats of a violent coup against the government in Beirut should they try. Meanwhile Israel’s ground assault continued, as did Hizbullah’s rocket attacks.

Investors cheered signs of more America-Iran talks. The S&P 500 rose by around 1%, nearing its peak in late January, while the NASDAQ 100 gained 1.8% and was on track for its longest winning streak since 2021. Asian markets also jumped. Oil prices fell sharply; Brent crude was down by more than 4%, as hopes of diplomacy eased fears of supply disruptions.

OpenAI released a new AI model focused on cyber-security to a handful of users. The firm said that GPT-5.4-Cyber would identify software vulnerabilities. The limited release follows a similar launch last week of Mythos, a cyber-security model made by Anthropic. AI firms are worried that their models could be used by bad actors to breach cyber defences.

Around 250 people were reported missing after a boat carrying Rohingya refugees and Bangladeshi nationals capsized in the Indian Ocean. The sinking, reportedly due to bad weather, happened last week, but the news has just been reported by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. More than 1m mainly Muslim Rohingyas have fled persecution in Myanmar for hellish refugee camps in Bangladesh.

Scott Bessent said Mr Trump's tariffs would be restored by July. In February the Supreme Court struck down the president's levies, but America's treasury secretary said they would be revived through a rule that allows taxes to be imposed on countries engaging in unfair trade practices. Mr Bessent also dismissed the IMF's cut of its global growth forecast for 2026, prompted by the war, claiming it "overreacted".

Amazon said it would buy Globalstar, a satellite company, for nearly $12bn. The deal will help the tech giant compete with Starlink, a satellite-internet service run by Elon Musk's Spacex. Amazon currently has around 200 satellites in low-Earth orbit; Globalstar has 24. Amazon hopes to deploy 3,200 by 2029. But Starlink dominates the business with about 10,000 satellites in orbit.

Figure of the day: 89%, how much the share price of Ralph Lauren, an American designer brand, has risen over the past year. Read about how American luxury is booming.

Photograph: Getty Images

Looking out for more credit cockroaches

As more American banks report earnings this week, including Bank of America and Morgan Stanley on Wednesday, investors will hunt for weakness. They are worried by wobbles in the private-credit market, which lends to riskier corporate borrowers and to which banks have some exposure.

JPMorgan Chase revealed few signs of stress in its earnings on Tuesday. America's largest bank made $16.5bn in net income in the first quarter, a 13% year-on-year increase, driven by strong trading revenue. But its boss, Jamie Dimon, still believes an eventual "credit recession" is inevitable.

In another hopeful sign, the benchmark S&P 500 index has recovered to its level before the Iran war began. But the share prices of many private-credit firms have not. Blackstone, Apollo and Blue Owl, three large lenders, trade at between 20% and 40% lower than at the start of 2026. Banks will need to assure investors that they are at no risk of contagion.

Photograph: Shutterstock

Little relief for Sudan’s strife

Three years into the country’s civil war, more than 33m people in Sudan require humanitarian assistance; at least 19m face acute hunger. Another 4.5m have fled abroad. The UN estimates that the conflict has set the economy back by decades: average income has fallen to a level not seen since 1992.

On Wednesday’s grim anniversary, officials, including foreign ministers from countries that have been providing aid, are meeting in Berlin to discuss how they can raise funds and expand their humanitarian efforts in Sudan. They are also trying to put pressure on the national army and its adversary, the paramilitary Rapid Support Forces, to come to a truce. The chances of that succeeding are slim. With about two months to go until the rainy season, both sides want to secure gains on the battlefield. Despite three years of bloodshed, neither yet feels it has a compelling reason to make peace.

Photograph: Reuters

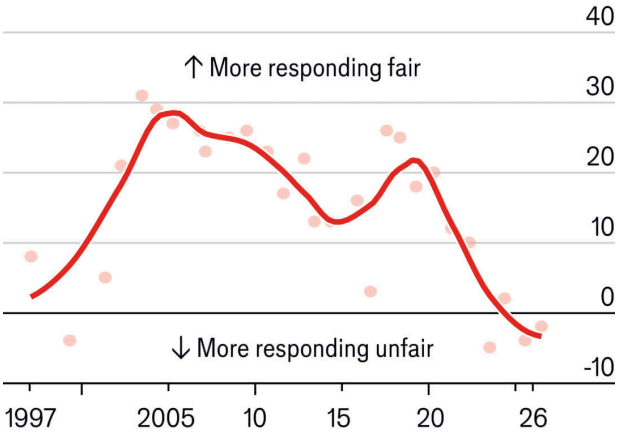
Tax day in America

April 15th is a date etched in American taxpayers' minds: by Wednesday they are due to file their annual tax return and pay Uncle Sam what they owe. But both Republicans and Democrats seem eager to make the day less painful, hatching plans to fund the government more by squeezing the richest few (the left), or foreigners (with tariffs, the right)—or by widening the already vast budget deficit.

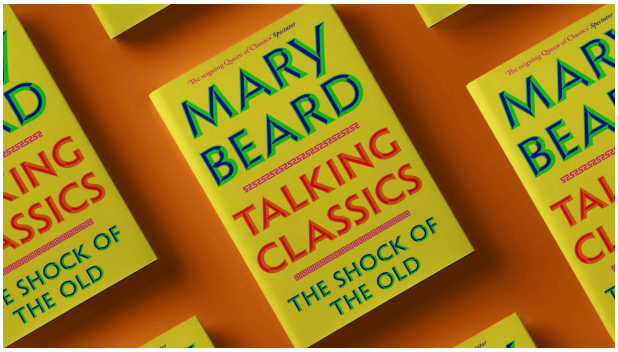
Last year's "One Big Beautiful Bill Act" extended most tax cuts from Donald Trump's first term that were set to expire and added extra goodies, including the notorious "no tax on tips". That enormously popular provision, and growing desperation for cost-of-living support, may be nudging Democrats towards their own tax-cutting ideas. Two moderate senators have released proposals to narrow America's base of income-tax payers. That reflects a recognition that distrust in government—and how it spends taxpayers' dollars—now has deep roots in American politics, from right to left.

No taxation, full stop

United States, net share responding their federal income tax is fair, percentage points



Source: Gallup

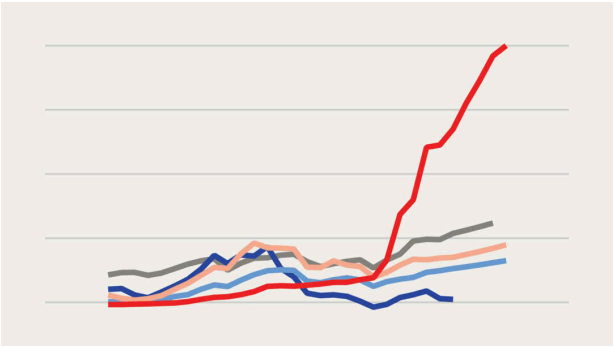


Photograph: Profile Books

Mary Beard makes her case for classics

Admirers of classics say studying the languages, literature and history of ancient Greece and Rome promotes logical thinking and reveals informative patterns. Nonsense, say its critics. The subject is steeped in whiteness, privilege and colonialism. Mary Beard, Britain's best-known classicist, sets out to defend the subject in a newly published book this week, "Talking Classics". But she shockingly discards most of the traditional arguments for it on page two.

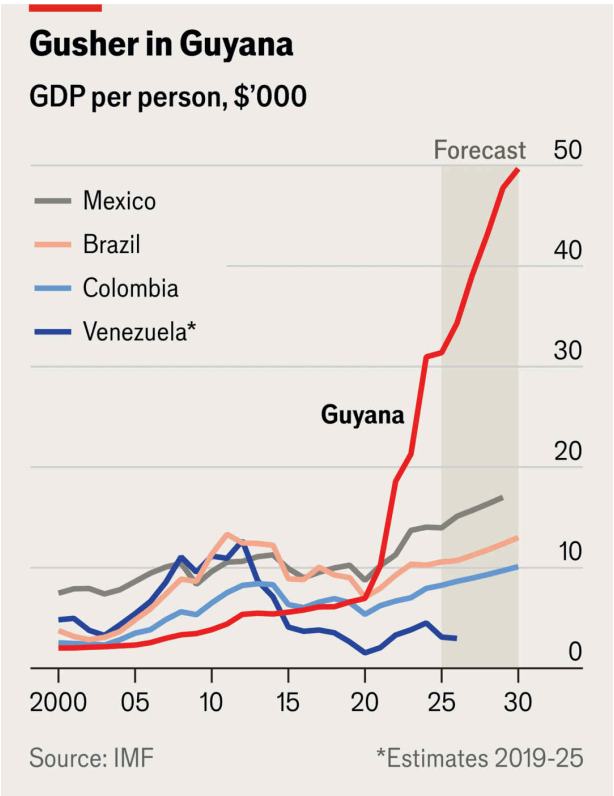
Instead she argues that classics is a good way to understand the relationship between the past and the present: unlike many distant periods in history, it offers plenty of surviving material. It raises thorny issues, around subjects like tyranny and imperialism, that resonate today. And instead of offering simple answers, it poses more complicated questions. So too does Ms Beard. Her pithy, enjoyable book epitomises the kind of thinking that the study of classics aims to encourage.



Photograph:

Data bite: The tiny state profiting from the war

A country of fewer than 1m people on the edge of South America is one of the Iran war's winners. Since 2019, when Guyana started production in offshore oilfields, its economy has quintupled—the fastest growth globally. If war keeps prices near $100 per barrel in 2026, and the operators of the Stabroek Block field succeed in boosting output by 2.5% to 940,000 barrels a day, Guyana will generate some $33bn in oil revenue this year, three-quarters more than predicted before the war. (Most of the oil goes to Europe, which is paying premiums.) The challenge for Guyanese politicians is to spread the bonanza's benefits and avoid the "resource curse".



Gusher in Guyana
GDP per person, $'000
Forecast
50
40
30
20
10
0
Mexico
Brazil
Colombia
Venezuela*
Guyana
2000
05
10
15
20
25
30
Source: IMF
*Estimates 2019-25

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to . We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Wednesday: Which American actress and film-maker directed the 2026 movie "The Bride!"?

Tuesday: Brussels is the capital of which region in Belgium?

The free thinking of one age is the common sense of the next.

Matthew Arnold