Binyamin Netanyahu said Israel would begin talks with Lebanon. But Israel's prime minister said strikes against Hizbullah, an Iran-backed militant group, would continue. Lebanese authorities said that Israeli attacks on Wednesday killed more than 300 people. Israel insists its neighbour is not included in America's and Iran's fragile ceasefire; Iran argues otherwise, and has threatened to withdraw from the agreement.

Iran's supreme leader said in a written statement that management of the Strait of Hormuz would enter a "new phase", signalling tighter control over shipping after the ceasefire. Mojtaba Khamenei has not been seen or heard in public since the war began. Meanwhile, Saudi Arabia said its oil-production capacity had fallen by about 600,000 barrels a day owing to recent attacks on its infrastructure.

American stocks rose for a seventh straight day; the S&P 500 is now on its longest run of gains in six months. Oil prices swung as traders weighed the risk of escalation in the Middle East. Brent crude settled at $95.92 a barrel, below its earlier peak in the day but still up by more than 1%.

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, announced a 32-hour ceasefire for Orthodox Easter, starting on Saturday. Mr Putin said that Russian troops would remain ready to respond to any "provocations". Ukraine had already called for a truce but said Russia had continued attacks; the country did not immediately respond to Mr Putin's announcement.

OpenAI said it would pause Stargate UK because of "regulation and the cost of energy". The American firm had pledged £31bn ($42bn) to the project, which aims to expand global data-centre capacity to run and train AI models. Its withdrawal will be a blow for Britain's government. OpenAI may be reducing its spending ahead of a possible initial public offering.

Meta signed a deal worth $21bn with CoreWeave, an American firm that rents out computing power. Meta is racing to build more powerful AI models; it already has access to CoreWeave's data centres though an earlier deal. Separately Amazon shed light on how much it earns from AI services for the first time. They bring in $15bn at an annualised rate, calculated according to first-quarter results, or roughly 10% of the company's cloud-computing revenue.

Melania Trump, America's First Lady, delivered surprise comments saying she was not a "victim" or friend of Jeffrey Epstein, a dead sex-offender, or his accomplice, Ghislaine Maxwell. She called on Congress to hold a hearing for his victims. It was unclear why she was saying so and precisely which reports she was denying; she said that fake accusations had been "circulating…for years".

Iran after the truce

The ceasefire declared on Wednesday may be fleeting: later that day Iran again struck Gulf states and, after Israel struck Lebanon, it kept the Strait of Hormuz closed. Yet if the truce stabilises, it could lead to an Iran that treats its citizens, neighbours and foes differently.

The balance of power has shifted from Iran's clerics to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps. Although the IRGC's domestic grip is as tight as ever, there are signs the regime is shaking off some of the late Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's strictures. Shortly after the ceasefire began, authorities freed a long-term political prisoner. Its henchmen let secular Iranians join their rallies. And state television broadcast interviews with unveiled women.

The direction of travel is far from settled. Hardliners are almost certain to push back against any hint of compromise, and the economic damage from the war could reignite public discontent. Much will hinge on whether the ceasefire holds.

Questioni for Meloni

Giorgia Meloni, Italy's prime minister, appears in parliament on Thursday for the first time since her right-wing government lost a referendum in March. That poll was nominally about changes to the judiciary but morphed into a vote on her policies in general. The defeat suggests that Italians are growing increasingly dissatisfied with their government.

Casting around for someone to blame, Ms Meloni forced a minister to resign. But it punctured the aura of political invincibility she has acquired since taking office in 2022. Lawmakers will therefore be keen to hear Ms Meloni's plans for the rest of her time in office, which must end by late 2027. So far, she has dismissed speculation about calling the election early, before the damage to Italy's economy from the conflict in the Middle East becomes truly apparent. A plan to change electoral laws in her favour has lost momentum since the referendum result. Attempting to restart it will be tricky.

The world’s spring economic stocktake

Scores of finance ministers and central bankers are preparing to gather in Washington, DC, for the spring meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Kristalina Georgieva, the IMF’s managing director, will raise the curtain with a speech on Thursday. She and the fund’s economists, who release their outlook for the world economy next Tuesday, will be scrambling to analyse the ceasefire between America and Iran, which has caused the price of oil to slump by about 15%.

The delegates also have other fissures in the world economy to examine. The fund’s research department has just published a paper lamenting “persistent and recently widening global imbalances”. Big current-account surpluses and deficits—most importantly in China and America respectively—are creating financial vulnerabilities. The answer, the authors argue, is not tariffs or industrial policy but synchronised rebalancing: tighter budgets in deficit countries, more consumption in surplus countries and more investment elsewhere. Getting the patients to take their medicine may be hard.

Now watch these drives

The Masters is the first of golf's four big annual tournaments. Its picture-perfect setting in Augusta, Georgia, inspires a civility sometimes missing from other contests, where spectators are more likely to heckle players and cheer foozles. But competition is fierce. When it starts on Thursday, Rory McIlroy, an Irishman, will be looking to defend his title (and win another famous, if unflattering, green jacket); his trickiest opponent may be Scottie Scheffler, an American and the world number one.

The sport's biggest rivalry (off the course at least) has cooled recently: that between America's PGA Tour and LIV Golf, a flashy upstart league funded by Saudi Arabia. Players from both tours compete in the Masters. After high-profile defections by PGA players to LIV, some are returning visor-in-hand, having missed the prestige and attention that the PGA provides. One, Brooks Koepka, had to donate $5m to charity as penance. The PGA once saw LIV as a bunker-size hazard; now it looks more like a divot hole.
