Donald Trump said the war in Iran was “close to over” as Pakistan’s army chief arrived in Tehran to try to advance peace talks between Iran and America. Field-Marshal Asim Munir is close to Iran’s leaders and Mr Trump, who has called him “my favourite field-marshal”. Meanwhile America’s Treasury Department imposed sanctions on more than two dozen individuals, companies and vessels linked to Iran’s oil trade.

Israel’s security cabinet is set to meet on Wednesday to consider a ceasefire in Lebanon, according to Reuters, a news agency. A senior official from Hizbullah, an Iran-backed militia, said that diplomatic efforts could soon produce a truce. Meanwhile Israel’s ground assault continued, as did Hizbullah’s rocket attacks on Israel.

Mr Trump threatened to fire Jerome Powell if he refused to resign as Fed chair after his term ends in May. Mr Powell has said he will not leave the job until a Department of Justice investigation into the renovation bill for the Fed’s headquarters is dropped. Mr Powell claims the probe is an attempt to pressure him into lowering interest rates.

The s&p 500 hit a record high as investors were buoyed by strong earnings, with banks such as Bank of America and Morgan Stanley beating expectations, while shares in large technology firms, including Nvidia, continued to rise. The index has rebounded sharply from its late-March low, as markets bet the Iran war will not cause lasting damage to growth or inflation.

A federal jury in America found that Live Nation, a concert promoter that owns Ticketmaster, operated as a monopoly. Jurors said Ticketmaster overcharged consumers and that Live Nation used its dominance to pressure venues and artists to use its ticketing services or risk losing access to major events. Live Nation denies the claims. A judge will now decide remedies, including a possible breakup.

ASML, a supplier of advanced chipmaking equipment, reported strong first-quarter earnings and raised its revenue forecast for the year to as much as €40bn ($47bn), which would be 22% higher than 2025. The Dutch firm said that rising demand for artificial-intelligence chips, driven by a data-centre investment boom, is outpacing supply. Shares rose by 1.2% on the news, briefly reaching a record high.

A 14-year-old pupil shot dead eight classmates and a teacher at a middle school in Kahramanmaraş, in southern Turkey, before killing himself. Officials said the attacker used weapons believed to belong to his father, a former police officer. The attack came a day after a separate school shooting in the nearby town of Şanlıurfa, which left more than a dozen people injured.

Looking out for more credit cockroaches

The market volatility caused by the Iran war has boosted trading income at America's biggest banks. Morgan Stanley reported a near-30% jump in profits in its first-quarter results on Wednesday; Bank of America made $30.4bn in revenue in the same period, topping analysts' estimates. On Tuesday JPMorgan Chase reported first-quarter net income of $16.5bn—a 13% year-on-year rise.

But investors will be combing the results for signs of weakness. They are worried by wobbles in the private-credit market, which lends to riskier corporations. Banks have exposure to such loans. Jamie Dimon, JPMorgan's boss, believes a "credit recession" is inevitable.

Although the benchmark S&P 500 index has recovered to its pre-war level, the share prices of many private-credit firms have not. As frothy as this earnings season has been, it may not be enough to assure investors that they are at no risk of contagion.

Little relief for Sudan’s strife

Three years into the country’s civil war, more than 33m people in Sudan require humanitarian assistance; at least 19m face acute hunger. Another 4.5m have fled abroad. The UN estimates that the conflict has set the economy back by decades: average income has fallen to a level not seen since 1992.

On Wednesday’s grim anniversary, officials, including foreign ministers from countries that have been providing aid, are meeting in Berlin to discuss how they can raise funds and expand their humanitarian efforts in Sudan. They are also trying to put pressure on the national army and its adversary, the paramilitary Rapid Support Forces, to come to a truce. The chances of that succeeding are slim. With about two months to go until the rainy season, both sides want to secure gains on the battlefield. Despite three years of bloodshed, neither yet feels it has a compelling reason to make peace.

Tax day in America

April 15th is a date etched in American taxpayers' minds: by Wednesday they are due to file their annual tax return and pay Uncle Sam what they owe. But both Republicans and Democrats seem eager to make the day less painful, hatching plans to fund the government more by squeezing the richest few (the left), or foreigners (with tariffs, the right)—or by widening the already vast budget deficit.

Last year's "One Big Beautiful Bill Act" extended most tax cuts from Donald Trump's first term that were set to expire and added extra goodies, including the notorious "no tax on tips". That enormously popular provision, and growing desperation for cost-of-living support, may be nudging Democrats towards their own tax-cutting ideas. Two moderate senators have released proposals to narrow America's base of income-tax payers. That reflects a recognition that distrust in government—and how it spends taxpayers' dollars—now has deep roots in American politics, from right to left.

Mary Beard makes her case for classics

Admirers of classics say studying the languages, literature and history of ancient Greece and Rome promotes logical thinking and reveals informative patterns. Nonsense, say its critics. The subject is steeped in whiteness, privilege and colonialism. Mary Beard, Britain's best-known classicist, sets out to defend the subject in a newly published book this week, "Talking Classics". But she shockingly discards most of the traditional arguments for it on page two.

Instead she argues that classics is a good way to understand the relationship between the past and the present: unlike many distant periods in history, it offers plenty of surviving material. It raises thorny issues, around subjects like tyranny and imperialism, that resonate today. And instead of offering simple answers, it poses more complicated questions. So too does Ms Beard. Her pithy, enjoyable book epitomises the kind of thinking that the study of classics aims to encourage.

Data bite: The tiny state profiting from the war

A country of fewer than 1m people on the edge of South America is one of the Iran war's winners. Since 2019, when Guyana started production in offshore oilfields, its economy has quintupled—the fastest growth globally. If war keeps prices near $100 per barrel in 2026, and the operators of the Stabroek Block field succeed in boosting output by 2.5% to 940,000 barrels a day, Guyana will generate some $33bn in oil revenue this year, three-quarters more than predicted before the war. (Most of the oil goes to Europe, which is paying premiums.) The challenge for Guyanese politicians is to spread the bonanza's benefits and avoid the "resource curse".
