The world in brief

Israel said it attacked two of Iran's nuclear facilities. There has been no release of radioactive material, according to Iranian state media. The strikes hit a heavy-water complex and a plant that produces yellowcake, a powdered uranium concentrate. Meanwhile the International Atomic Energy Agency, the world's atomic watchdog, warned of the risk of a "major radiological accident" in the region.

Earlier Israel had warned it would "escalate" its offensive in response to Iranian attacks on its citizens. The country said it struck Tehran as military strikes continued across the Middle East on Friday. Two ports in Kuwait were damaged in drone and missile attacks while Saudi Arabia said Iran targeted Riyadh with missiles. Missile alerts were heard in Bahrain and Qatar.

America's House of Representatives will apparently not vote on a bill the Senate passed earlier to reopen the Department of Homeland Security, which has been without funding for six weeks. Republican House leaders rejected the measure for failing to fund immigration enforcement. Mike Johnson, the House speaker, will put forward a separate stopgap funding bill. The Senate already left for a two-week recess.

The price of Brent crude, the global benchmark for oil, rose above $110 a barrel. American stocks continued to fall, deepening losses from Thursday—the worst day yet for stocks since the war began. The slump means Wall Street is on track for its fifth consecutive weekly decline, the longest such streak in nearly four years.

Austria became the latest country to propose social-media restrictions for young people. The country is drafting legislation to ban under-14s from sites such as TikTok. Similar restrictions will take effect in Indonesia this weekend. Australia became the first country to ban under-16s from social-media platforms in December, with various countries following suit. At least a dozen countries, including Britain and Spain, are exploring the idea.

A group of Iran-linked hackers claimed to have accessed and published personal emails belonging to Kash Patel, the FBI director. The FBI acknowledged Mr Patel's inbox was compromised by "malicious actors" but said the leaked messages and photos were "historical" and did not contain government information. The government offered a $10m reward for help identifying the hackers.

Pernod Ricard, a French spirits-maker, said it was discussing a merger with Brown-Forman, the firm that owns Jack Daniel's, America's largest whisky producer. Pernod said that if the deal went ahead it "would be akin to a merger of equals". Both firms have been hit hard by a slump in demand for their booze.

Wavering support for America's war

Foreign ministers of the G7 met outside Paris on Friday. They are hoping to gain some insight from the American secretary of state, Marco Rubio. What comes after a month of conflict in the Middle East: a hollow victory, desperate negotiations or a reckless escalation?

The answer will influence how far America's allies are willing to go to help re-open the Strait of Hormuz. Donald Trump has veered from asking them to send ships to denouncing them as "cowards" for not responding, and telling them they are not needed anyway. He has even suggested leaving the strait for others to deal with. "At a certain point it'll open itself," Mr Trump said recently.

After Mr Trump's tariffs, threats to seize Greenland and courtship of Russia, their patience is thin. They were not consulted about the war. Yet European countries and Japan depend on the Gulf's oil and gas exports. And they have no better solution than Mr Trump does.

America’s vibe-cession deepens

American consumers are feeling the pinch. The University of Michigan’s consumer sentiment index, published on Friday, fell to 53.3 in March, down from 56.6 in February. It is not far from the lowest reading in its 70-year history.

Even before Donald Trump went to war, . That dour mood persisted despite . GDP growth was strong, unemployment fairly low. Inflation wasn’t quite tamed, but settled below post-pandemic extremes. Worries about a recession in 2023-24, because of rising interest rates, and in 2025, because of Mr Trump’s tariffs, proved unfounded.

There are plenty of theories for the gap between feelings and figures: the lingering effect of high prices; social-media angst; distaste for high interest rates; spillover from the negativity of politics. Whatever the cause, the war is set to widen it. Petrol prices are up sharply. Americans hate few things more than paying extra at the pump.

Japan’s balancing act over Iran

Japan has a lot to lose from a blocked Strait of Hormuz. In normal times, more than 90% of its imported crude oil transits the waterway. This week Japan began releasing oil from its strategic reserve. After the oil crisis in the 1970s, it built one of the largest stockpiles in the world, equivalent to 254 days of consumption. This time, 80m barrels (enough to last around 45 days) will be released.

The war loomed large over last week’s summit between Japan’s prime minister, Takaichi Sanae, and Donald Trump. Mr Trump called on allies to send warships to help open the strait. Ms Takaichi pandered to Mr Trump by promising to buy Alaskan oil, but deftly sidestepped the question of naval support. Japan has historically had relatively warm relations with Iran, potentially providing a useful diplomatic channel. This week, Iran signalled it would allow Japanese vessels to pass safely through the strait. But the offer may not go down well with Mr Trump.

Raye’s ambitious next act

Raye, a British soul and R&B singer, was far from unknown when the lead single of her second album, “Where Is My Husband!”, went viral in 2025. The 28-year-old, who has drawn comparisons to Amy Winehouse, a singer who died in 2011, picked up a record haul of six Brit awards the previous year.

Raye’s new record, “This Music May Contain Hope” is released on Friday. A 73-minute concept album revolving around the four seasons, it is epic in its scope and ambition, moving beyond the TikTok-pleasing soundbites that propelled her to a new level of stardom. The album harks back to the orchestral 1960s style of Shirley Bassey, a Welsh belter of notes, while embracing modern pop. Its quality vindicates her choice to pursue her own vision after she felt stifled on a big label. Perhaps that should come as no surprise. As she said when winning her Brits in 2024: “I’m in control. I’m my own boss.”
