Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, claimed Iran no longer has the capability to enrich uranium or make ballistic missiles. He dismissed accusations that Israel had pulled America into the war as "fake news" and said Israel would "hold off" on future attacks on Iranian gas fields at Donald Trump's request. America's president meanwhile insisted he was "not putting troops anywhere" when asked about deploying forces to the Middle East.

Scott Bessent, America's treasury secretary, said the Trump administration would consider easing sanctions on Iranian oil at sea as it tries to quell volatile energy markets. The comments came as Iran warned it would expand strikes on energy infrastructure across the Gulf. Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, jumped above $118 a barrel before falling slightly; gas prices also surged.

Meanwhile America's war secretary, Pete Hegseth, said the aims of the campaign in Iran were "unchanged" and that the operation would end "at the president's choosing". He also confirmed his department would ask for $200bn in additional funding for the military operation from Congress. General Dan Caine, the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, said that Iran still has "some" military capability.

Mr Trump said Japan was "stepping up" support in the Iran war "unlike NATO", during a friendly meeting in Washington with Takaichi Sanae. He did not elaborate. Japan's prime minister condemned Iranian strikes and warned the global economy would take "a huge hit" from the conflict. But things took an awkward turn after Mr Trump compared America's attack on Iran to Japan's bombing of Pearl Harbour in 1941.

The Bank of England left its benchmark interest rate at 3.75% and warned war in Iran will cause a "shock to the economy". The bank expects Britain's annual inflation rate to reach nearly 3.5% in March. Government bond yields rose on the announcement. The European Central Bank and the Bank of Japan also held interest rates on Thursday, as did America's Federal Reserve on Wednesday.

EU leaders failed to convince Hungary's prime minister, Viktor Orban, to approve a €90bn ($103bn) loan package to Ukraine at a summit in Brussels. Hungary and Slovakia accuse Ukraine of delaying repairs to the Druzhba oil pipeline, which crosses its territory and was damaged in a drone attack in January. "We are ready to support Ukraine when we get our oil," said Mr Orban.

Eli Lilly, an American pharma giant, announced "positive" results from the first late-stage trials of its experimental weight-loss drug, retatrutide. Diabetic patients lost an average of 16.8% body weight. Retatrutide differs from existing treatments by mimicking three hunger-regulating hormones rather than one or two. The results could give Lilly another edge over its Danish rival, Novo Nordisk, in the weight-loss wars.

Why war in the Gulf is disrupting airlines elsewhere

The bosses of Europe's airlines jet into Brussels on Thursday to discuss their industry. The main topic will surely be the Middle East, vital for the flow of passengers as well as oil. Cities like Doha and Dubai act as mid-points between America, Asia and Europe, contributing to the success of local carriers like Emirates, Etihad and Qatar Airways. These "super-connectors" are struggling to restore even limited services, because their hub airports are targets for Iranian drones.

Airlines in Europe are not flying high, either. The oil shock has doubled the price of jet fuel—particularly bad news for cheap carriers like EasyJet, for whom it is a higher proportion of costs. Some, like Ryanair, are more sheltered for now because of how they hedge against price increases. And legacy airlines like British Airways (part of IAG) have scooped up some of the Gulf carriers' frequent fliers outside the Middle East. But the mood in Brussels will be downcast.

The ECB will try to reassure markets

In February euro-paying citizens were finally enjoying stable inflation rates of around 2%, the European Central Bank's target. But war in the Gulf now threatens to push inflation back up to uncomfortable levels. When the ECB's governing council met on Thursday, it faced the tricky task of soothing markets without raising rates.

It may soon have to. Christine Lagarde, the ECB's president, has promised to "do all that is necessary to ensure inflation is under control" throughout and after the conflict. Markets are expecting two quarter-point rate increases, to 2.5%, in 2026. If oil prices average $140 a barrel for two months—a severe but plausible scenario—inflation in the euro zone could surpass 4%, according to Oxford Economics, a research firm. But Europe's economy is not suffering from shortages of labour and equipment, as it was during the inflation shock caused by Russia's invasion of Ukraine. The ECB would do well to wait and see how energy prices evolve.

A fraught end to Ramadan in Lebanon

Thursday evening marks the end of Ramadan and the start of the Eid al-Fitr holiday. But there will be little celebration in Lebanon, which is in the third week of a conflict with Israel that few Lebanese wanted. More than 900 Lebanese have been killed and 1m displaced since March 2nd, when Hizbullah, a Shia militia and political party, fired a volley of rockets at Israel. On Wednesday morning a series of Israeli air strikes hit central Beirut; one toppled an entire building. There are growing fears that Israel plans to occupy a swathe of south Lebanon.

The last war between Israel and Hizbullah ended with a fragile ceasefire in November 2024, but Israel kept up near-daily attacks on the militant group. Hizbullah's popularity, once high, is at a nadir in Lebanon. Even its Shia constituents are frustrated: they have received little help rebuilding homes and businesses destroyed in the previous war. Now they have been dragged into another one.

Takaichi is in a tight spot

Japan’s prime minister is in Washington on Thursday for her second meeting with America’s president. When Takaichi Sanae hosted Donald Trump in Tokyo last October the pair hailed a new “golden age” in their countries’ relations. This meeting will be thornier. Ms Takaichi is the first leader of a major American ally to face Mr Trump in person since he demanded help to reopen the Strait of Hormuz. Most, including Japan, have not offered up such support. Mr Trump has since lashed out at them for dodging his draft. He claims that America does not “need or desire” their assistance anyway.

The Japanese navy could, theoretically, help unstopper the strait: it has minesweepers capable of clearing the explosives America accuses Iran of laying. But Japan’s pacifist constitution makes deploying them now extremely difficult. Ms Takaichi has hinted at exploring what “can be done” within those “bounds”. Any military support for America’s war would probably prove explosive at home.

A reality show gets the last laugh

The title of "LOL: Last One Laughing", a reality-TV show, sounds silly. The rules are simple: ten comedians are locked in a room together for six hours and must try to make each other laugh while keeping a straight face. But the format is seriously popular and has been reproduced in 30 countries, from Albania to Australia.

In 2025 the British version was one of Amazon Prime Video's biggest hits in the country. The second season of Britain's "LOL" begins on Thursday and promises to be excellent fun. The cooped-up comedians include David Mitchell, Alan Carr and Bob Mortimer (last season's victor). Viewers should expect gags, quips and plenty of pained expressions as the contestants try to suppress their mirth. Meanwhile the comedy buffs behind "Saturday Night Live UK", which launches in Britain this weekend, will be hoping for a similarly cheery reaction from fans. After all, laughter is contagious.
