Donald Trump threatened to “completely obliterate” Kharg Island, the site of Iran’s main oil-export terminal, as well as the country’s energy plants and oil wells. Meanwhile thousands of American paratroopers began arriving in the Middle East, according to Reuters, adding to the arrival of roughly 2,500 Marines over the weekend. Sources told the news agency that no decision has been made to send ground troops into the country.

The UN said two of its peacekeepers were killed and two others wounded when an explosion destroyed their vehicle in southern Lebanon. The cause of the blast is unknown. It follows another deadly incident a day earlier, when a projectile hit a UN base. Meanwhile, Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel’s prime minister, said the army will move further into the country.

A ballistic missile fired from Iran entered Turkey’s airspace and was shot down by NATO defences, Turkey said. It is the fourth such incident since the start of the Iran war. Iran has denied launching missiles at its neighbour. The episode highlights the risk of the conflict spilling into NATO territory. Turkey is seeking to mediate and has joined talks to reopen the Strait of Hormuz.

Israel's parliament passed a law making the death penalty the default sentence in military courts that try Palestinians in the occupied West Bank for deadly attacks. The measure fulfils a key demand of Mr Netanyahu's far-right allies. Although it also allows capital punishment in civilian courts, that applies only to crimes deemed to threaten Israel's existence; critics say the law will in practice target Palestinians, not Jewish extremists.

A Russian oil tanker carrying around 100,000 tonnes of crude arrived in Cuba, the first such delivery in three months, as the island grapples with severe fuel shortages and blackouts. American authorities allowed the tanker through, despite having vessels nearby that could have intercepted it and earlier threats by Donald Trump to penalise countries exporting oil to Cuba after tightening sanctions on Venezuela.

Some of Ukraine's allies asked the country to stop attacks on Russian energy infrastructure to ease pressure on global oil prices, Volodymyr Zelensky said. The Ukrainian leader said he would only agree to the request if Russia ceased its strikes on Ukraine. On Monday Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, passed $116 a barrel, before dropping slightly. Its price has increased by 58% so far this month.

Michael Rousseau said he would step down as the boss of Air Canada following a row over botched condolences. He was criticised for delivering a message only in English, one of two official Canadian languages, following a runway collision in New York on March 22nd in which two Air Canada pilots died. Mr Rousseau's replacement will be selected based on criteria including "ability to communicate in French", the airline said.

The Houthis have entered the Iran war

After the tens of thousands of bombs that have been dropped across the Middle East, the few missiles that Yemen’s Houthi militia fired at Israel on March 28th may seem trivial. But it may herald the opening of a new front in the Iran war.

At the start of the war the militia considered restraint to be in its interest. It hoped to strike a deal with Saudi Arabia to bolster Yemen’s flagging economy. That has not materialised. The war gives the Houthis fresh leverage. If they target shipping in the Red Sea while the Strait of Hormuz remains closed, oil prices could surge from their current price of around $116 a barrel to close to $200. It would take only a few strikes to make the Red Sea impassable. The question then will be whether the economic cost of the war becomes high enough for America to abandon it.

Trump asks Congress for more money

As excuses for missing a deadline go, being distracted by the war you started is not the worst. But Donald Trump is late indeed to present his budget request, which should set out his funding priorities for the next fiscal year. Congress, which signs the cheques, expected the blueprint on February 2nd. The White House now says it will land this week, two months late.

The main fiscal action of Mr Trump's presidency has probably already happened. His "Big Beautiful Bill", passed last year, cut taxes and boosted spending on defence and immigration enforcement. It also set the stage for budget deficits of around 6% of GDP over the next decade. But the wish-list will nonetheless be informative. One question is whether his request for national-security spending will rise because of Iran. In January Mr Trump said he wanted a defence budget of $1.5trn, the largest ever. And has since requested $200bn for his new war.

Europe braces for impact

Europe's economy is among those most exposed to the effects of the war on Iran. On Monday the EU published its consumer and business surveys, showing just how much the first weeks of the war have soured moods. In March consumer confidence fell by 3.4 percentage points, its lowest level in two and a half years. The economic-sentiment indicator, which includes businesses, also fell. Annual inflation could rise above 4% in the European Central Bank's "severe scenario" of a longer energy disruption with supplies affected until next year—something that looks increasingly plausible. Preliminary price data for March will be released on Tuesday.

European consumers' confidence was below the long-term average even before the war. According to an early release of the figures, it took a deep dive in March. Businesses' outlook dropped sharply, too, according to an earlier release of the purchasing-managers' index, as input costs ticked up following the spike in energy prices. For now, Europe's recovery has hit a wall.

A changing of the guard in Myanmar

Myanmar’s legislature has begun the process of electing a new president. On Monday members nominated Min Aung Hlaing, a general who seized power in 2021, to serve a full five-year term. Judged against any reasonable standard, the junta supremo’s record in office should be an obstacle to his ambition. Since coming to power, the economy has shrunk by more than an eighth in real terms. And the regime has lost control of more than half the country to a violent uprising.

But General Min Aung Hlaing is unlikely to face much competition in the final vote in parliament on Tuesday. He banned any serious opposition from legislative elections, so the army controls 86% of the seats. Under the constitution the junta chief has, however, had to hang up his uniform to become president. Some inside and outside of Myanmar hoped that this might dilute his power. They will be disappointed. General Min Aung Hlaing has named a weak underling, General Ye Win Oo, to succeed him. The coup-maker remains firmly in charge.

America’s historic heat wave

Many parts of America have spent much of March sweltering under an unprecedented heatwave. In one week alone, more than 660 places—mostly in the south and west—experience their hottest-ever day for March, setting new records for at least a third of the country. Daniel Swain, a climate scientist, reckons that the heatwave is probably “among the most statistically anomalous extreme heat events ever observed in the American Southwest”.

The World Weather Attribution Group, a network of climate modellers, estimates that human-caused climate change made these conditions 800 times more likely to occur. Worse is yet to come. A recent report by the World Meteorological Organisation suggests that the temperature increase caused by each extra unit of greenhouse gases is greater than it once was. That is particularly bad news because recent observations suggest extreme heatwaves—the deadliest type of weather event—are themselves made more frequent and severe by rising temperatures than climate models previously projected.
