Donald Trump described America's attack on Iran as "our last best chance to strike". He suggested the conflict would last "four to five weeks" but that America had the "capability to go far longer". Earlier the Trump administration said it was sending more American troops to the region. Six American service members have died so far. More than 500 people have been killed in Iran, according to the Iranian Red Crescent Society, a charity.

Iran said it closed the Strait of Hormuz and threatened to set any ship that tries to pass through "ablaze". The route carries a third of global seaborne oil flows. Earlier European gas prices soared by more than 50% after QatarEnergy LNG, the world's biggest producer of liquefied natural gas, halted production following Iranian drone attacks on its facilities. The price of Brent crude rose to as much as $80 a barrel.

Global stockmarkets fell as war intensified. Airline stocks bore the brunt of the sell-off following airspace closures across the Middle East; Emirates and Etihad said they were restarting "repositioning, cargo, and repatriation" flights on Tuesday in co-ordination with UAE authorities. Defence and energy stocks surged. Gold prices rallied as investors sought a safe haven, while American treasury yields moved higher too as rising oil prices stoked fears of inflation.

Conflict spread in the Middle East. Israel carried out strikes in Lebanon, including in Beirut, the capital, in response to a missile attack on Israel by Hizbullah. Lebanon's health ministry said the Israeli strikes killed at least 31 people. Its prime minister, Nawaf Salam, vowed that his government would take "immediate steps" to prevent the Iran-backed militant group launching military operations from Lebanon.

France's president, Emmanuel Macron, said the country would increase the size of its nuclear arsenal for the first time in decades as defence ties with America fray. France, the only nuclear power in the European Union, will allow nuclear warheads to be temporarily stationed in allied European countries, he said, adding that the changes would enable "Europeans to regain control of their own destiny".

A suspected Iranian drone struck a British military base in Cyprus. British and Cypriot officials said the airfield suffered minor damage but suggested there were no casualties. The attack occurred shortly after Sir Keir Starmer allowed America to use British bases to launch "defensive" strikes on Iranian missile sites. Britain's prime minister said the country "will not join offensive action now".

Nvidia, a chip giant, said it would invest $2bn each in Lumentum and Coherent, two American companies which develop photonics technologies that power the infrastructure behind artificial intelligence. Shares in both companies, whose systems use light to transfer data, rose by more than 10% following the announcement. Nvidia's share price rose by as much as 4.9% on Monday.

Figure of the day: $85bn, the value of venture-capital investments in European startups in 2025, up from $22bn a decade earlier. Read

Hizbullah enters the fray

When American and Iranian officials met in January in Geneva for a last-ditch attempt at diplomacy, one of the many things they failed to agree on was Hizbullah. America and Israel wanted Iran to withdraw its decades-long support for the Lebanese militia. Iran refused. Ever since America attacked Iran on Saturday, people have been asking the opposite question: will Hizbullah support Iran?

Late on Sunday it provided an answer by launching a barrage of missiles at Israel. Hizbullah's decision to enter the fray could be deeply unpopular in Lebanon. The country is still recovering from Hizbullah's last conflict with Israel which, by the time a ceasefire was reached in 2024, had displaced more than a million people. That is partly why the group did not join the fighting when Israel attacked Iran last year. This time round, though, America and Israel have plainly stated that their intention is to dismantle Iran's regime. Confronted with this existential threat, it looks like Hizbullah's domestic political concerns will count for little.

What’s next for the war in Iran?

It took American forces nine months to find and capture Saddam Hussein in 2003. The killing of Ali Khamenei took only a day. On Sunday morning, less than 24 hours after America and Israel first attacked Iran, news of the supreme leader’s death was being reported on state television.

But that does not mean the war itself will end swiftly. Iran responded by firing a barrage of missiles: hundreds at Israel and the United Arab Emirates; dozens at Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Oman and Saudi Arabia. Most were intercepted, but each successful Iranian strike increases the likelihood of a wider conflict. Israel’s interceptor stocks can hold for days, but probably not weeks.

Nor is there any clear sign that America and Israel’s actions so far will achieve their goal of dismantling the Iranian regime. The country’s security forces are still capable of suppressing mass unrest. And a government collapse creates new problems, including how to deal with Iran’s nuclear facilities. None can be solved quickly.

Iran’s isolation is becoming evident

Iran’s regime has few friends to call on. The Islamic Republic is not popular in Europe, where many countries are calling for a democratic transition. It boasts of close ties to Russia, which recently conducted naval exercises with Iran, and China, which has reportedly sold the country air-defence systems. Both denounced America and Israel’s air campaign, but have stayed out of the fight

Gulf Arab monarchies, meanwhile, got no thanks for urging America to pursue diplomacy. Iran fired hundreds of missiles and drones at them—not just at American bases but also at civilian targets. Even Oman, which was mediating between America and Iran during their most recent nuclear negotiations, was struck.

That attack, in particular, seemed counterproductive. Iran’s foreign minister tried to do damage control, suggesting that Iran’s revolutionary guard corps, which answers directly to the supreme leader, was acting on orders “given to them in advance”. For Oman’s part, its foreign minister wrote on social media that “the door to diplomacy remains open”.

Congress confronts Trump's latest foreign intervention

When Donald Trump took to social media to announce the death of Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, he boasted of having achieved "justice" for "all great Americans". Democrats, unsurprisingly, feel differently. Most argue that American strikes on Iran contravene the War Powers Act of 1973—legislation meant to prevent presidents from unilaterally committing the country to an armed conflict without congressional approval.

Congress will now debate a resolution to rein in Mr Trump in the coming days. It is unlikely to pass: similar votes on military action in the Caribbean and Venezuela floundered. And most of Mr Trump's supporters in the House of Representatives have cheered him on in the Middle East.

But there are growing signs that some of the president's allies are also tiring of his penchant for overseas intervention. Tucker Carlson, a right-wing commentator, called the attack on Iran "disgusting and evil". Marjorie Taylor Greene, an ex-congresswoman and disenchanted former Trump loyalist, described it as the "worst betrayal".
