Iran threatened to strike Gulf ports after America began a blockade of ships using Iranian ports and coastal areas. Ships arriving at or leaving non-Iranian ports will be left alone, the Pentagon said. Pakistan's prime minister, Shehbaz Sharif, said peace efforts were continuing. On Monday Donald Trump said Iran wants a deal "very badly" but it "will not have a nuclear weapon". Iran's president, Masoud Pezeshkian, said his country is open to talks that comply with "international law".

Hizbullah's leader, Naim Qassem, said that Lebanon should cancel talks with Israel scheduled for Tuesday in Washington. Lebanon's government wants to use the meeting to negotiate a ceasefire. Meanwhile, the Red Cross said it is "deeply distressed" by the killing of a volunteer, who died on Monday from injuries caused by an Israeli strike on southern Lebanon on Sunday.

In his first press conference since defeating Viktor Orban in Hungary's election, Peter Magyar pledged closer ties with the European Union and promised to stop blocking the EU's €90bn ($105bn) loan to Ukraine. He added, "MAGA is not our deal." Mr Magyar's toppling of a MAGA hero has troubled Europe's hard right.

One populist German lawmaker said Mr Trump's "friendship" had "hung like millstones" around Mr Orban's neck.

Canada's ruling Liberals gained a parliamentary majority following three by- elections. The party, led by the prime minister, Mark Carney, needed to win just one of the three ballots held on Monday. It won two, with one result still to be declared. Mr Carney's popularity is built, in large part, on his determination to stand up to Mr Trump.

LVMH, a French luxury group, said conflict in the Middle East hurt sales in the first quarter; shoppers stayed away from malls across Gulf countries because of missile strikes. Sales rose by 1% year on year; at its core fashion and leather-goods division they fell by 2%. A post-pandemic luxury boom has given way to weaker demand in Asia and Europe; LVMH's results dim hopes of a rebound.

Over 1,000 writers, actors and directors signed an open letter opposing Paramount Skydance's deal to buy Warner Bros Discovery. Signatories warned that the merger would lead to fewer jobs, fewer films and less choice for audiences. David Ellison, Paramount's boss, has pledged to invest in the Hollywood studio and to release at least 30 films a year.

Pope Leo XIV vowed to "continue to speak out loudly" despite attacks by Mr Trump, who called him "weak on crime" on social media. The American pontiff has criticised the Trump administration's deportation policies and war in the Middle East. Mr Trump also shared, then deleted, an AI image of himself as a Christ-like figure. He implausibly claimed he thought it portrayed him as a doctor.

How long can Iran stand the blockade?

Iran has used its blockade of the Strait of Hormuz to exert pressure on America to cease its attacks. Now, Donald Trump wants to turn the tables. America's own blockade, which started on Monday, aims to sever Iran's economic lifeline to weaken its bargaining position: without oil exports Iran will struggle to pay for vital imports, even if they can still arrive through Caspian ports or overland.

But Iran is prepared for disruption. In 2020, when Mr Trump tried to crush the country's economy, crude exports fell below 400,000 barrels a day, down from 2.2m b/d in 2018. This time it can endure for perhaps six months by printing money, selling 100m or so barrels of oil in storage off Malaysia and China, and securing informal credit from suppliers of imports. The blockade will hurt America and its allies too, by further squeezing energy markets. Iran's leaders may still have time on their side.

Oil shock chops forecasts for the global economy

Even if the ceasefire between America and Iran holds, and shipping through the Strait of Hormuz normalises, the drop in global oil supplies is expected to keep the price of crude above $90 a barrel until the end of 2026. America's blockade of the strait, which started on Monday, will increase the upward pressure on prices.

That will preoccupy policymakers who are gathering this week in Washington for the IMF's and World Bank's spring meetings. On Tuesday the IMF is expected to forecast higher global inflation and weaker growth. Bank of America has already cut its growth forecast for 2026 by 0.4 percentage points, to 3.1%, and raised its inflation outlook by 0.9 percentage points.

Developing markets will feel the most pain. Higher import bills are widening their trade deficits and weakening currencies. Investors could pull out cash. The IMF has warned it may need to extend $50bn in emergency support to such countries.

Sánchez’s outspoken foreign policy

On Tuesday Pedro Sánchez, Spain’s Socialist prime minister, will meet China’s leader, Xi Jinping, during his fourth visit to the country in as many years. They will talk about trade and investment, but Mr Sánchez wants to send another message: that Spain and the European Union need alternatives to the alliance with Donald Trump’s America. Mr Sánchez has been the most confrontational of Europe’s leaders, preventing America from using joint air and naval bases and Spanish airspace for the war on Iran.

This stance is popular in Spain and in some other countries, but some in the EU are less trustful of China. And Spain may face reprisals. Israel has expelled it from the international monitoring force in Gaza; Mr Trump has mused about barring imports from Spain and moving the military bases. Yet Mr Sánchez appears undeterred. On his return from China, he will gather sympathetic leaders from Europe and developing countries to vent more frustrations about Mr Trump.

China’s exports defy expectations

When Donald Trump applied tariffs of up to 145% on Chinese goods last year, it looked as though China’s export machinery would stutter. But by the end of 2025 the country had a record $1.2trn trade surplus, with $3.8trn in exports. Figures released on Tuesday showed that China’s exports rose by 14.7% in the first three months of this year, compared with the same period last year.

Exports were hit by the closure of the Strait of Hormuz. Still, China’s products are fiercely competitive in other countries. Its “real” exchange rate—adjusted for prices—has fallen by 15% since 2022. Since the tariffs, Chinese firms have proven skilful at finding new markets for their wares: exports to America dropped by about $100bn last year, but this was more than compensated by additional sales elsewhere, worth some $300bn. China’s manufacturers hope the boom can continue. America’s tariffs on China—though still high—have fallen considerably. And while demand at home remains limp, foreign buyers are happily picking up the slack.

The Philippines' fiercest family feud

A congressional committee in the Philippines heard its first evidence in impeachment proceedings against Sara Duterte, the vice-president, on Tuesday. Ms Duterte is accused of threatening to kill the president, Ferdinand "Bongbong" Marcos, and of skulduggery with public funds. She spurned the committee's invitation to dispute the accusations (and has separately denied wrongdoing). If congress impeaches Ms Duterte and finds her culpable, it would thwart her ambition to succeed Mr Marcos in elections in 2028. She is currently the frontrunner.

Ms Duterte is the daughter of Rodrigo Duterte, president between 2016 and 2022. Mr Marcos made an enemy of her by sending her father to prison last year. Mr Duterte is now detained by the International Criminal Court, suspected of committing crimes against humanity during a bloodthirsty campaign against illegal drugs. The Marcos camp fears that if Ms Duterte becomes president, she will take revenge on them. Impeachment could be their best chance of stopping her.
