Iran's new supreme leader pledged to "avenge" his country's martyrs in his first public comment since succeeding his father. In a written statement aired on state television, Mojtaba Khamenei threatened to open new fronts against America and pledged to continue the blockade of the Strait of Hormuz, a key oil-shipping route. He is believed to have been injured in an American strike.

Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, jumped back above $100 a barrel. Iran struck several more vessels in the Persian Gulf, setting two ablaze off the coast of Iraq. Donald Trump said it was of "far greater interest and importance" to "[stop] an evil Empire" than worry about energy. "When oil prices go up, we make a lot of money," he posted.

A gunman who rammed a car into a synagogue in Michigan was found dead inside his vehicle. According to a county sheriff, the suspect drove the car "with purpose" down a hallway inside the building, which houses a school. Police reportedly found explosives inside the vehicle. One security guard was injured. The synagogue confirmed that all students and staff were safe.

Israel continued striking Beirut, targeting Hizbullah, a militia backed by Iran. Bombs fell on residential areas. In a televised speech, the country's prime minister, Nawaf Salam, said Lebanon could not accept "under any circumstances" becoming "an open arena for the wars of others" once again. So far Israeli bombs have reportedly killed over 680 people and displaced over 800,000 others.

Honda said it faces losses worth up to ¥2.5trn ($15.7bn) over two years after cancelling the planned production of three new electric-vehicle models in North America. The Japanese carmaker is grappling with a slowdown in America's electric-vehicle market, and expects to make an annual net loss of up to ¥630bn, its first since it went public nearly seven decades ago.

China approved a law that will force the country's ethnic minorities to learn Mandarin, the language of the dominant Han Chinese group. It will become the main language in schools and official communication. The legislation also calls for "new social customs" to encourage living in mixed communities. Critics say that the law on "ethnic harmony" will further marginalise several of China's 56 ethnicities.

Smiljan Radic has been awarded the Pritzker Prize, considered the most prestigious prize in architecture, for his "radical originality". The jury lauded the Chilean architect, known for his oblique forms and natural ingredients, for favouring "fragility over any unwarranted claim to certainty". His diverse structures—described as both "temporary, unstable, or deliberately unfinished" and "optimistic and quietly joyful"—include the fibreglass Serpentine Pavilion in London.

How to ease an energy shock

Expect more turbulence in markets on Thursday, as the world reacts to Iran's "most intense" operation of the war so far. The previous day Iran's regime vowed to "not allow even a single litre of oil" through the Strait of Hormuz, and said it regarded any vessel connected to America, Israel or its partners as a legitimate target. Projectiles struck three ships in or near the waterway; two tankers in the Persian Gulf were set ablaze. Shell, the world's largest LNG trader, declared force majeure on several contracts, excusing the company from meeting its obligations.

Governments are scrambling to control prices. On Wednesday the 32, mostly Western, members of the International Energy Agency announced that they would collectively release 400m barrels of oil from reserves, roughly equivalent to four days' worth of global consumption.

Meanwhile Donald Trump's promise that American warships would escort tankers through the strait "if needed" looks far-fetched. The US Navy has repeatedly denied shipowners' requests in recent days, according to Reuters.

American hopes for a Kurdish uprising dashed

The peshmerga, the military forces of Iraq's Kurdistan Region whose name translates to "those who face death", were poised to cross into Iran following America's and Israel's attacks. Now they are hesitating. Is it a ruse? The swift collapse of central authority in Iran, which America and Israel expected after killing Ali Khamenei and wrecking much of Iran's military, has not happened. Iran has aimed missiles and drones at the Kurdish region and warned their leaders against backing an insurgency. Turkey and Iraq have also rattled sabres, wary that Kurdish gains might embolden those dreaming of a Kurdish state.

Donald Trump has accepted the new reality. "I don't want the Kurds going in," he said—for their safety, of course. Israel, which tried to ignite an uprising, is probing other fronts. The loyalties of Iran's ethnic minorities are divided. Many are Shia and fear domination by more numerous Sunni neighbours and the foreigners waging war. But in the past Iran has unravelled when its regimes collapsed.

America is racing China to get back to the Moon

On Thursday Jared Isaacman, the head of America's space agency, will outline what's next for its Artemis II mission—set to send astronauts round the Moon for the first time in 54 years. Originally scheduled for early February, lift-off has been repeatedly delayed by problems with the rocket's plumbing.

While Artemis II has been having various leaks plugged NASA has been busy re-engineering the entire Artemis programme. This reflects the growing realisation that China's less-ambitious programme might put its first astronauts on the Moon before America gets back there. America's previous lofty goal of landing Artemis III on the Moon next year has been replaced by a slower but steadier approach. NASA will first test out lunar landers developed by Elon Musk's SpaceX and Jeff Bezos's Blue Origin, and has deferred its planned Moon landing until 2028. In December Mr Isaacman warned Congress that if China pulls ahead, America "may never catch up".

A Medicaid funding fight in Minnesota

In February the Trump administration launched a “War on Fraud”. A battle is playing out in a Minnesota courtroom. On Thursday parties will gather for a hearing over the federal government’s withholding of a quarter of a billion in funding for Medicaid — government health care for the poor—for the Democrat-run state.

The administration is linking the funding freeze to a sprawling welfare scandal thought to have cost Minnesota taxpayers hundreds of millions. Prosecutors have been bringing fraud-related charges since before Donald Trump’s second term, and have indicted almost 100 people. Now the Trump administration is pulling new levers—and more pain could be coming. If “Minnesota fails to clean up the systems”, warned Mehmet Oz, the federal director of Medicaid, it will “rack up a billion dollars” in withheld payments this year. The state argues it is trying to address fraud and that the government is “weaponising” health-care funding as political punishment.

The grand old man of British art

At 88 years old, British painter David Hockney remains innovative and inquisitive. “A Year In Normandie And Some Other Thoughts About Painting” opened on Thursday at London’s Serpentine North gallery. Inspired by the Bayeux Tapestry, a Norman artefact, its title piece is a continuous frieze that wraps around the gallery interior.

There the resemblance to the 70m-long embroidered cloth ends. Mr Hockney’s work is no battle scene, but a pastoral panorama assembled from numerous digital paintings created on his iPad during the lockdowns of 2020. Its stillness recalls a second source: 14th-century scroll paintings from China.

To pass along it is to accompany the artist on a slow and deeply peaceful walk through the seasons. There are also ten new pictures in the gallery’s centre—five portraits, five semi-abstractions, meditating on similar natural themes, and looking at age-old themes through a sharp modern lens.
