The gunman arrested at the White House Correspondents' Association dinner on Saturday will be charged on Monday, officials said. Thirty-one-year-old Cole Tomas Allen had reportedly written a manifesto in which he promised to target Trump administration officials, "prioritised from highest-ranking to lowest". Donald Trump—unnamed, but the likely target of the foiled attack—claimed the perpetrator was "anti-Christian".

Abbas Araghchi, Iran's foreign minister, arrived in Russia, where he is expected to meet Vladimir Putin to discuss the war in Iran. Mr Trump said that if Iran's leaders wanted to make a deal they only had to call. Elsewhere, Lebanese officials said an Israeli air strike killed 14 people, the deadliest attack since a ceasefire came into force.

Oil prices rose as the prospect of peace diminished. Brent crude, the global benchmark, rose to above $108 a barrel. European stocks were flat, with the STOXX 600 index largely unchanged in morning trading. Asian shares rose, however, fuelled by optimism for tech stocks, despite the uncertainty caused by conflict in the Gulf. Japan's Nikkei and South Korea's KOSPI indices both hit record highs.

China blocked Meta's $2bn acquisition of Manus, an artificial-intelligence startup, ordering both firms to cancel the transaction. The social-media giant had tried to buy the Chinese company as part of its strategy to invest heavily in AI. Although initially welcomed as a victory for China's AI sector, the deal drew scrutiny from the government, which feared losing its tech to American ownership.

Naftali Bennett and Yair Lapid, two former Israeli prime ministers, merged their parties in an attempt to topple Binyamin Netanyahu in upcoming elections. The right-wing Mr Bennett will lead the unified party, called "Together". Mr Lapid, the centrist opposition leader, said the alliance would "put an end to internal divisions". Both men have been critical of Mr Netanyahu's leadership during Israel's wars.

An apparent suicide-bombing killed Mali's defence minister, Sadio Camara, at his home near Bamako, the capital. The killing came during one of the largest co-ordinated attacks by Islamic rebel groups in recent years. They included strikes on an international airport and towns farther north. The government has not announced a death toll, but declared two days of national mourning.

Sun Pharma, India's largest drugmaker, said it will acquire Organon, an American pharmaceutical company focused on women's health. Sun, which mostly makes generic medicine, is hoping to grow its patented medicines business. The $11.8bn deal is the largest ever cross-border acquisition by an Indian drugmaker. Sun claims the combined company will be in the top 25 of such firms globally by revenue.

Elon Musk and Sam Altman battle in court

A trial worthy of Hollywood is about to begin in California. The world's richest man, Elon Musk, will face off against Sam Altman, boss of the world's most famous AI company. Mr Musk helped set up OpenAI, the firm behind ChatGPT, as a non-profit venture in 2015, but departed in 2018. He argues that Mr Altman (and others) went against that founding principle by shifting to a profit-driven structure. He wants OpenAI and Microsoft, one of its backers, to pay more than $134bn in damages—to go to OpenAI's charitable arm, he says—and remove Mr Altman and Greg Brockman, another co-founder. OpenAI claims this is a baseless attempt by a weaker rival (Mr Musk owns xAI as part of SpaceX, his rocket company) to undermine the industry front-runner.

Both billionaires are expected to testify. A verdict may take weeks. Betting markets don't much fancy Mr Musk's chances. The jury, selected on Monday, can expect some drama with their duty.

Stasis in the Strait

Bahrain, currently president of the UN Security Council, will chair a meeting on maritime security on Monday. The issue is crucial for both the kingdom and its neighbours in the Gulf, but the meeting will only highlight their powerlessness. The Strait of Hormuz is still blockaded by both America and Iran. On average four ships make it through each day (down from around 125 normally). Gulf states want allies to send warships as escorts. That looks unlikely before the war ends.

And a conclusion does not seem imminent. Abbas Araghchi, the Iranian foreign minister, has spent recent days in Pakistan, which has been trying to mediate a deal, but has refused to meet the Americans. The American delegation hasn't turned up at all—the country's diplomats say that they remain unsatisfied with Mr Araghchi's latest proposal for ending the war. The coming days may bring a fresh round of talks. Until then, the standoff continues.

An awkward royal visit

The ideal time for a state visit is not shortly after a possible assassination attempt on the host. But even before a gunman stormed the White House correspondents' dinner on Saturday, King Charles III's trip to America, which begins on Monday, had diplomats on edge. The visit, ostensibly for the 250th anniversary of American independence, has become a mission to save the "special relationship".

Donald Trump resents British objections to his foreign forays, particularly in Iran. Meanwhile, Sir Keir Starmer, Britain's prime minister, is "fed up" with the economic impact of the president's actions. And polling suggests the American and British publics are souring on each other's countries, too. Mr Trump is a fan of Britain's royal family: he described his stay at Windsor Castle with King Charles in September as "one of the highest honours" of his life. But pomp and pageantry can go only so far in healing a rift.

South Africa’s precarious progress

Monday is “Freedom Day”, when South Africans celebrate the anniversary of the first elections in which all races could vote in 1994. Much has improved in the 32 years since. The country now has a basic welfare state and a larger black middle class. More South Africans socialise across racial lines; two-thirds say they would support the best person for president, regardless of race. The economy—moribund for at least a decade—has recently shown signs of life, partly because of belated reforms to state-owned enterprises such as Eskom, the utility company.

But war in the Gulf has slowed that momentum; South Africa’s reliance on imported fuel makes it vulnerable to rising prices. Though somewhat tempered by a coalition government since 2024, the ruling African National Congress party is still plagued by corruption and incompetence. On April 23rd the president suspended the head of police, the latest powerful figure embroiled in alleged graft. South Africa has come far; it has much further to go.
