The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: AP

Pete Hegseth claimed that America and Israel would soon gain control of Iranian airspace and deliver “death and destruction all day long”. The American defence secretary said the war was entering a new phase with “larger waves” of attacks. Mr Hegseth also said that a US Navy submarine sank an Iranian warship in the Indian Ocean. He called it America’s first sinking of an enemy ship with a torpedo since the second world war.

America’s Senate rejected a measure that would require Congress to approve Donald Trump’s military operations in Iran. The outcome was expected; the House of Representatives will vote on Thursday. Meanwhile Iran’s foreign ministry dismissed the White House’s claim that America’s pre-emptive attack was necessary because Donald Trump had a “feeling” that Iran would strike first. Mr Trump was acting “on behalf of Israel”, the ministry said.

Iranian Kurdish groups based in Iraq were reportedly considering entering the fray. The groups have been engaged in a decades-long conflict with Iran’s regime in an attempt to win greater autonomy. The Kurdistan Freedom Party confirmed talks with America and said some of its troops were on standby. Should they be deployed, they would be the first ground forces to enter the war.

China set an uninspiring growth target for 2026 of 4.5-5% at the National People's Congress, its rubber-stamp parliament. That is its lowest target since 1991. Last year it aimed for 5% growth (which, to little surprise, it hit exactly). The modest target comes despite persistent deflation and high youth unemployment, both proof that China should aim higher.

Voting began in Nepal's first general election since a student-led revolution in September forced KP Sharma Oli to resign as prime minister. The uprising was caused by widespread dissatisfaction with Nepal's three dominant parties. A newly established fourth party led by Balendra Shah, the rapper-turned-mayor of Kathmandu, is expected to sweep to victory.

Vladimir Putin suggested that Russia might stop supplying Europe with natural gas in favour of "other markets" that are willing to pay more for it. The EU slashed imports of Russian gas in December, committing to end them by 2027. Russia's president said his government would deliberate on the issue, but that the country would continue supplying gas to Serbia, Hungary and Slovakia.

British police arrested three men on suspicion of spying for China. One suspect is the spouse of Joani Reid, a Labour MP; she denied knowledge of her husband's activities. Last year Britain's top prosecutor dropped a case against two other men accused of funnelling "politically sensitive information" to the country. Critics have accused Sir Keir Starmer, Britain's prime minister, of being too soft on China.

Figure of the day: Six percentage points, the polling lead that Tisza, a Hungarian opposition party, had over Viktor Orban's Fidesz as of February 27th. Follow the race for April's elections on our tracker.

Photograph: Getty Images

Iran’s new power struggle

American and Israeli bombardment and an internet blackout make it difficult to read public opinion in Iran. The regime is still widely loathed. But as bombs fall dissent has retreated indoors. On Iran’s streets mourning for Ayatollah Ali Khamenei—killed on Saturday—has eclipsed grief for the thousands of protesters slain in January at his command.

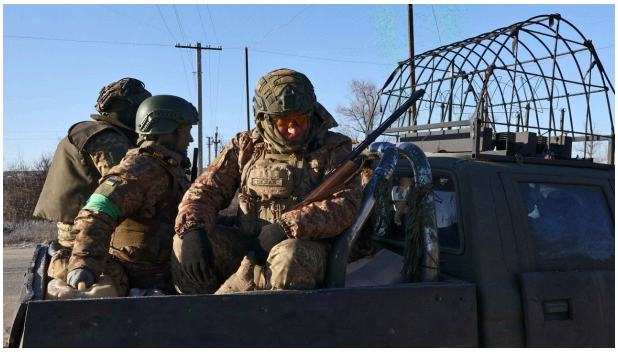
A worn-out regime has found renewed purpose under fire. Anti-Americanism and anti-Zionism, which had become threadbare ideologies, have gained fresh force. The restraints that Khamenei placed on Iran’s armed forces are off. And political hardliners, emboldened by war, appear to have replaced reformists in the struggle to name Khamenei’s successor as supreme leader. Talk of a managed transition—or of repairing the rupture with America that has defined the regime since 1979—has faded. Reports suggest the leading contender is Khamenei’s son, Mojtaba Khamenei, who has close ties to the regime’s security apparatus.

Photograph: Marijan Murat/dpa

An unfolding energy nightmare

Energy analysts modelling a war involving Iran have long feared two developments: the Islamic Republic lashing out at its oil-rich neighbours and a blockade of the Strait of Hormuz, through which a third of global seaborne crude and a fifth of liquefied natural gas transit daily.

Now both are happening at once. Iran has struck energy facilities in Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates. The Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, Iran's praetorian guard, have declared Hormuz closed and vessels have been hit. As a result, energy prices are catching fire. Iraq is running out of storage for its stranded oil and cutting output; Kuwait may follow. Asian buyers are already turning elsewhere to replace the oil and gas they no longer get from the Gulf, pushing up prices for everyone. It is unclear whether Donald Trump's promise of insurance and naval escorts for tankers in the Gulf will do much to get oil flowing again. The economic consequences of the energy shock could be far-reaching.



Photograph: AP

How the Iran war hurts Ukraine

Ukraine’s president, Volodymyr Zelensky, expects trilateral talks with America and Russia to go ahead this week despite the outbreak of war in the Middle East. Iran’s regime is an ally of the Kremlin and has supplied drone technology to Russia’s armed forces. But the war could have negative consequences for Ukraine. Higher oil prices will bring some relief to Russia’s hard-pressed economy. And the need for American air-defence interceptors by Israel and America’s Gulf allies will mean that fewer are available for Ukraine.

Even so, things are going a bit better for Ukraine on the battlefield. The head of its armed forces, Oleksandr Syrsky, claims that his troops retook more territory in February than Russia captured. The coming of spring should bring some relief to civilians whom Russia has tried to freeze into submission through relentless strikes on Ukraine’s power grid. Progress at the talks, however, is highly unlikely.

Photograph: Getty Images

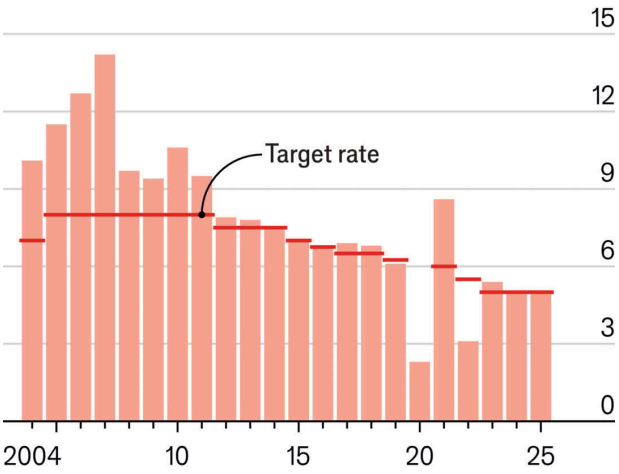
China’s rubber-stamp parliament convenes

This week China’s “two sessions”, the annual meeting of its legislature, the National People’s Congress, and that of its advisory body, kick off in Beijing. Li Qiang, the prime minister, will set out the country’s goals for the coming year to 2,900-odd delegates at the NPC on Thursday. He may trim China’s annual GDP growth target from “around 5%” (as it has been for the past three years) to 4.5-5%, amid a lingering property slump.

China’s next five-year plan, which will cover the period from 2026 to 2030, will also be released during the NPC session, which usually lasts around a week, for delegates to give their approval. It will set out guidance for officials on everything under the sun, from encouraging China’s cautious consumers to spend more, to boosting birth rates. But the focus will be achieving self-sufficiency in technologies where it still relies on foreign equipment or know-how, such as semiconductors and aircraft engines.

Where to next?

China, GDP, % increase on a year earlier



Sources: LSEG Workspace; Bloomberg

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 GMT on Friday to . We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Wednesday: Arturo Toscanini, Leopold Stokowski and Claudio Abbado all achieved fame in what role?

Tuesday: Which book by Nate Silver, published in 2012, is about the art of interpreting statistics?

You have to be slightly blind to believe in any cause.

Elizabeth Smart