Iran rejected an American ceasefire proposal, insisting instead on a permanent end to the war, according to state media. It conveyed its response via Pakistan, which is mediating between the combatants. Donald Trump has threatened to strike power plants and bridges if Iran does not reopen the Strait of Hormuz by Tuesday. Attacks on civilian infrastructure can be illegal under international law.

Meanwhile Israel attacked Tehran, Iran's capital, hitting aircraft and infrastructure at several airports, including Mehrabad, the city's main domestic airport. Separate strikes shut petrochemical plants in Asaluyeh, including parts of the South Pars complex, where a large share of Iran's gas is produced and exported from. Iran warned it would launch "more crushing" attacks if strikes on non-military sites continue.

The price of Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, yoyoed as investors weighed the chances of an American-Iran ceasefire. Earlier it topped $110 a barrel before falling. On Sunday OPEC+, a cartel of oil-producing countries and their allies, said it would increase production by 206,000 barrels a day in May. But that may prove inconsequential while the Strait of Hormuz is shut.

Barings Private Credit enforced a cap on redemptions, at 5% of shares per quarter, after investors tried to withdraw over 11% of shares in the first quarter. The asset manager is the latest private-credit fund to enforce a limit on withdrawals in response to a surge in redemption requests from investors worried about their loans. It will add to fears about a developing private-credit crisis.

Ukraine continued bombarding Russia's energy infrastructure. According to satellite images provided by NASA, an overnight drone attack set fire to an oil terminal in the Black Sea port of Novorossiysk, one of Russia's main oil-exporting hubs. Last month, as Russia celebrated a windfall from the Iran war and increased prices for Russian oil, Ukraine hit two of its Baltic ports, cutting weekly oil exports by around 40%.

Viktor Orban, Hungary's prime minister, convened an emergency meeting after explosives were found near a pipeline that carries gas into Hungary from Russia. Opposition politicians accused his party of staging the incident ahead of elections next week. Mr Orban's populist-nationalist party is currently behind in the polls. Throughout his campaign, Mr Orban has blamed a "Kyiv-Brussels-Berlin" axis for conspiring to prevent Hungary from accessing cheap Russian fuel.

Four astronauts entered the Moon's gravitational sphere, over 230,000 miles away, where the Moon's gravitational pull is stronger than the Earth's. NASA's Artemis II mission will continue its flight to the far side, where its crew will try to recreate the Earthrise photo, taken in 1968. This will be the farthest humans have ever travelled in space.

Donald Trump’s looming deadline for Iran

On Monday, after the White House’s Easter Egg Roll, Donald Trump will give a press conference. Expect him to boast about America’s rescue of an airman shot down in Iran.

The mission was undoubtedly difficult, and the stakes were high. Had the Iranian regime found the airman first he would likely have become a source of leverage, alongside the Strait of Hormuz. Captured pilots often take on totemic significance in American wars.

But the rescue has not cooled the temperature of the conflict. Monday is the deadline Mr Trump set for Iran to either make a deal with America or reopen the Strait (or it was—a cryptic social media post saying only “Tuesday, 8:00 PM Eastern Time” suggests he may have extended it). Over the weekend he issued aggressive warnings about striking civilian infrastructure on Tuesday if Iran does not comply. Threatening such acts—which are generally considered war crimes—shows how little in this conflict is going America’s way. No wonder he would rather focus on tales of derring do.

English doctors down stethoscopes (again)

Early on Tuesday morning more than 50,000 resident doctors in England will go on strike for the 15th time in three years. The group, who represent almost half of all doctors in the country, are embroiled in a bitter dispute with the government over pay, which has been declining in real terms since 2008 (despite a 22% pay rise in 2024).

The strikes are a major headache for the National Health Service. Millions of patients still languish on waiting lists; emergency services are stretched dangerously thin. Strikes will force hospitals to cancel thousands of routine appointments and scheduled surgeries. To keep essential services going the NHS must find around £300m ($397m) for senior doctors to cover shifts.

In response, the government has withdrawn an offer to create 1,000 specialised training posts, arguing that it can no longer afford them. This has made doctors even more annoyed. They complain of being burned out, and of spiralling student debt and rising demands. Many are threatening to find work abroad instead.

Emmanuel Macron’s party looks to his successor

Ten years ago on Monday Emmanuel Macron launched En Marche!, a centrist movement, in his home town of Amiens. He used it to win the French presidential election a year later. But there are very few plans to celebrate the anniversary, partly due to differences among centrists over his succession. That race is now under way.

The president’s party, now called Renaissance, is led by Gabriel Attal, a former prime minister. Mr Attal probably wants to run for the presidency in 2027, and has distanced himself from the unpopular Mr Macron. Polls, however, suggest that Edouard Philippe, another ex-prime minister, is better placed to beat either Jordan Bardella or Marine Le Pen from the populist right in a second round run-off. On the centre-right Bruno Retailleau, the Republicans’ leader, and David Lisnard, the mayor of Cannes, have also suggested that they will stand. The already crowded field is likely to become even more so.

Method in the madness

Anyone living with a basketball fan will have noticed a strange malady in recent weeks: distraction, sleeplessness, emotional volatility and constant talk of “bracketology”. The affliction, known as “March Madness”, is caused by an American college-basketball tournament. Over three weeks, dozens of teams are whittled down to one champion thanks to a ruthless single-elimination knockout format. The men’s final takes place on Monday in Indianapolis.

The competition has been around since 1939. It is not just the action on the court that counts. Millions of people aim to predict the outcome. Workplaces have bracket pools in which colleagues vie to pick the most games right. Because of the unpredictability of the tournament—upsets and chaotic victories abound—a complete basketball novice can win cash and bragging rights. On Sunday, in the women’s final, UCLA beat South Carolina. In the men’s final Michigan will play Connecticut. Polymarket, a big prediction market, currently gives Michigan a 73% chance of winning.
