Donald Trump warned that Iran could be “taken out in one night” and “that night might be tomorrow”, ahead of his deadline of 8pm Eastern time on Tuesday for Iran to re-open the Strait of Hormuz. The president said his administration had a plan to “decimate” every bridge and power plant in Iran if no agreement is reached. Talks co-ordinated by Pakistan and other countries are continuing.

Iran’s top military commander said Mr Trump’s comments were “delusional”. Earlier the regime rejected an American ceasefire proposal, reportedly insisting instead on a permanent end to the war. Meanwhile Israel attacked Tehran, Iran’s capital, hitting aircraft and infrastructure at several airports, including Mehrabad, the city’s main domestic airport. Separate strikes shut petrochemical plants in the city of Asaluyeh, including parts of the South Pars gas complex.

Four astronauts aboard NASA’s Artemis II mission witnessed a total solar eclipse and lost contact with Earth for about 40 minutes as they passed behind the Moon. Earlier they travelled farther from Earth than any humans before, surpassing the record set by Apollo 13 in 1970. The astronauts also spoke to Mr Trump, who invited them to the White House.

Anthropic, an American AI lab, said it had committed to buy "multiple gigawatts" of computing capacity from Broadcom and Google. The deals could cost hundreds of billions of dollars. Anthropic wants to boost capacity amid surging demand for Claude Code, its coding tool. OpenAI, a rival firm, recently signed a number of its own computing deals.

Vietnam's lawmakers unanimously elected To Lam, the leader of the country's Communist Party, as state president. The appointment is unprecedented for Vietnam, where unlike in China, leadership of the state and the party have traditionally been separate. The centralisation of power will help Mr Lam carry out his economic reforms, though it has raised fears of increased authoritarianism.

At least ten Palestinians died after Israeli missiles hit an area beside a school used by displaced families in central Gaza, the enclave's health officials said. The strike followed fighting between local residents and a militia aligned with Israel. The violence underscores how shaky the ceasefire remains, with hundreds reportedly killed since it took effect.

Barings Private Credit enforced a cap on redemptions, at 5% of shares per quarter, after investors tried to withdraw over 11% of shares in the first quarter. The asset manager is the latest private-credit fund to enforce a limit on withdrawals in response to a surge in redemption requests from investors worried about their loans. It will add to fears about a developing private-credit crisis.

Trump threatens war crimes in Iran

Donald Trump has vowed to bomb Iran hard enough to send it “back to the Stone Ages”. On Saturday he gave Iran a 48-hour deadline to reopen the Strait of Hormuz, an ultimatum Iran has so far dismissed. A day later America’s president announced his next targets: “Tuesday will be Power Plant Day, and Bridge Day, all wrapped up in one.”

Such attacks could amount to serious war crimes. Power plants and other civilian infrastructure are generally protected under the laws of war. These sites can lose that protection if they are used for military purposes, but only if their destruction provides a “military advantage” that outweighs civilian harm; America’s armed forces usually determine the legality of any strikes on a case-by-case basis. Mr Trump’s suggestion that “each and every one” of Iran’s power plants be hit “simultaneously” would cause considerable suffering among the country’s 93m people. By any reading of the laws of war, that is the definition of an indiscriminate attack.

A MAGA pilgrimage to Budapest

J.D. Vance, America's vice-president, arrives in Budapest on Tuesday to show his support for Viktor Orban, Hungary's prime minister, ahead of parliamentary elections on April 12th. Most opinion polls show Mr Orban's party, Fidesz, well behind its upstart challenger, Tisza, led by a former Fidesz man, Peter Magyar.

Mr Orban has fostered close ties with leading figures on the American right ever since his party won election in 2010. His government financed the Danube Institute, a conservative think-tank, to export its hard-right politics around the world. For MAGA Republicans Mr Orban is a model to emulate: a scourge of the woke, a defender of borders, tradition and Christianity. Mr Vance's visit has been cast by Mr Orban's government as a celebration of the two countries' ideological ties. Yet Mr Orban might have hoped that Donald Trump would have come instead. Notwithstanding the polls, there is much uncertainty ahead of the election. But America's president is known to stay away from losers.

Taiwan’s opposition leader visits China

On Tuesday the leader of Taiwan’s main opposition party, Cheng Li-wun, travelled to China at the invitation of President Xi Jinping—the first such trip in a decade. The Kuomintang (KMT) and the Chinese Communist Party were once sworn enemies. Now China sees the KMT as its best chance of peacefully reuniting the island with the mainland. Ms Cheng has frequently asserted that both sides of the Taiwan Strait are part of “one China”.

If Ms Cheng were to make similar comments during a formal visit to the mainland it would be a coup for China’s propaganda machine. Ms Cheng’s movements are being closely watched in America, too, where a bipartisan group of senators has been urging Taiwan’s parties to unite behind a proposed $40bn increase in defence spending, which Ms Cheng is blocking. But in roughly a month there is a summit planned between Donald Trump and Mr Xi, at which China’s president is expected to press for reduced American arms sales to Taiwan.

A bond market tug of war

Governments' borrowing costs have been in flux almost everywhere. In the turmoil of the Iran war bond yields first soared—reaching highs not seen in Britain since 2008 or Japan since 1997—before falling back last week.

Optimists might conclude that yields have dropped because hostilities will soon end, allowing oil to flow freely through the Strait of Hormuz. But optimists generally do not pursue careers in bond investing. In the case of the Iran war, the job means fretting about stagflation: economic stagnation combined with high inflation. Borrowing costs are whipsawing because these two dangers tug them in opposite directions.

Governments most exposed to inflationary pressure from Hormuz's closure have seen their yields jump highest (Britain, India). Early in the war traders bet that the Federal Reserve would stop cutting rates to contain the inflationary effects of the energy shock. Now they expect cuts again to promote growth—something that could exacerbate inflation. The longer Hormuz stays shut the higher the stakes get.
