

Catch up: calls for impeachment in South Korea; Namibia's first female president

Opposition parties in South Korea submitted a motion to impeach the president, Yoon Suk Yeol, for treason. On Tuesday Mr Yoon declared martial law but parliament voted to block the move, deeming it unconstitutional. The president was forced to reverse course mere hours later. He had accused the opposition Democratic Party of sympathising with North Korea and banned “all political activities”.

South Korea's finance ministry promised “unlimited” liquidity to shore up markets, which were rocked by Mr Yoon's declaration. The Bank of Korea, the country's central bank, held an emergency meeting and said it was “keeping all options open until the markets stabilise”. The won fell to a two-year low against the dollar overnight, but recovered slightly after the government's response.

Namibia elected its first female president. Netumbo Nandi-Ndaitwah, vice-president of the ruling Swapo party, took 57% of the vote in the southern African country. But logistical problems, including a shortage of ballot papers, had prompted officials to lengthen the voting period by three days. Most opposition parties claimed that was illegal and said they would dispute the results.

China banned the export to America of rare minerals used to make semiconductors and military equipment. China provides most of the minerals that fall under the ban, which include gallium, germanium and antimony. On Monday President Joe Biden placed limits on the sale of American-made high-bandwidth memory chips to more than 100 Chinese companies, a move China called “illegal”.

Thousands of protesters converged on Georgia’s parliament for a sixth straight night to demand that the government resume negotiations over the country’s admission to the EU. Irakli Kobakhidze, the prime minister, threatened to punish his political opponents, whom he accused of orchestrating the demonstrations. Meanwhile Georgia’s ombudsman accused police of torturing protesters and subjecting them to “the harshest treatment”.

Rebels in Syria advanced towards Hama, the country’s fourth-biggest city. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said that Hayat Tahrir al-Sham, the Islamist group that launched a surprise offensive in north-west Syria last week, has now taken control of several towns in the city’s surrounding province. In response Syrian and Russian air forces have carried out several strikes in the area, according to the organisation.

Jasleen Kaur, a 38-year-old Scottish artist, beat three other finalists to win this year’s Turner prize, Britain’s most prestigious contemporary-art award. Her solo exhibition, which explored ideas of Scottish-Sikh identity, featured Irn-Bru, a popular Scottish fizzy drink, and a vintage Ford Escort car covered in an enormous doily. She was awarded £25,000 ($32,000).

Figure of the day: 1962, the last year when France’s National Assembly brought down a government. Read the full story.

France's government on the edge

Michel Barnier's minority government may collapse on Wednesday when the French National Assembly votes on two motions of no confidence. Both were tabled on Monday in response to the prime minister's use of a constitutional provision to try to force a budget through parliament without a direct vote. Marine Le Pen's hard-right National Rally, which tabled one motion, says it will also back the other, tabled by the left-wing alliance.

The two blocs have the numbers to topple Mr Barnier. President Emmanuel Macron could ask him to stay on temporarily, while he searches for a replacement. This would enable the government to use special measures to continue spending at levels authorised by this year's budget, without inflation adjustments, into 2025. The last time Mr Macron lost a prime minister, in July, it took him two months to name a successor. This time the markets may not give him that luxury.

The new map of Syria

It has been a week since rebels launched a surprise offensive in northern Syria. They are consolidating their control of Aleppo, Syria's second city, from which Bashar al-Assad's regime has retreated. The insurgents have pushed back the Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF), an America-backed, mainly Kurdish militia that governs the north-east of the country.

The rebel advance has stopped on the northern outskirts of Hama, 120km south of Aleppo. Where it goes next will depend in part on geopolitics. Turkey is supporting the rebels. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan wants to push back the SDF, which Turkey considers a terrorist group, and wants Mr Assad to negotiate a deal that would allow Syrian refugees in Turkey to return home. The rout of the regime gives Mr Erdogan more leverage. And with Mr Assad's chief backers, Russia and Iran, embroiled in other wars, he is more isolated than ever.

Milei's lessons for Trump

On Wednesday the Conservative Political Action Conference, the premier talk-fest for conservative American lawmakers, hosts its first event in Argentina. Javier Milei, Argentina's president, is expected to speak alongside Jair Bolsonaro, Brazil's hard-right former president, and Lara Trump, co-chair of the Republican National Committee. Mr Milei, who gave an interview to The Economist last week, admires her father-in-law—he was the first leader to meet Donald Trump after his re-election.

But the populists meeting in Buenos Aires disagree about a lot. Mr Milei has cut public spending and red tape with promising results. Monthly inflation is down from 13% to 3%. Mr Trump also wants lower taxes and less regulation. But whereas America's president-elect is an enthusiastic protectionist, Mr Milei believes in open markets and free trade. He hates big budget deficits of the sort that Mr Trump is likely to run. His experiment is more promising than the one Mr Trump plans to conduct.

Trouble with the rouble

Over the past month Russia's currency has tumbled. At its lowest level one week ago the rouble was down by almost 13% against the dollar and by 11% against China's yuan. The immediate cause was the expanding of American sanctions on November 21st to cover Gazprombank, the largest Russian lender not previously subject to them. The restrictions come at a time when Russia's economy is showing signs of strain. Inflation is rising again and interest rates are now at their highest level since 2003.

A weaker rouble is a doubled-edged sword for the Kremlin. It increases the rouble value of oil exports, helping to contain the government's growing deficit. Yet it also pushes up the price of imported goods. China has become Russia's biggest trading partner in recent years, providing more than a third of all imports, as well as high-tech inputs that are crucial for the armed forces. After two years of good growth, 2025 might be tougher for Russia's economy.

SCOTUS tackles healthcare for trans youth

The divisive question of gender transitioning for adolescents arrives at America's Supreme Court on Wednesday. In United States v Skrametti, the justices will examine whether Tennessee's ban on puberty blockers and hormone treatments for minors diagnosed with gender dysphoria violates the 14th Amendment.

The challengers—three transgender children and their parents, joined by the federal government—cite a recent Supreme Court ruling on discrimination against trans employees. Tennessee cannot bar medical treatments for trans youth, they say, while permitting these therapies for other children to treat conditions such as early puberty or endometriosis.

The plaintiffs persuaded a district-court judge to block the law in 2023. But two months later the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals sided with Tennessee, saying that since the law bans “sex-transition treatments for all minors, regardless of sex” it is not discriminatory. The Supreme Court's decision, expected in the spring, will affect similar laws in 23 other states.

Daily quiz

The Economist

We will serve you a new question each day this week. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and, as important, tell us the connecting theme. Email your responses (and include mention of your home city and country) by 1700 GMT on Friday to QuizEspresso@economist.com. We'll pick randomly from those with the right answers and crown three winners on Saturday.

Wednesday: Which two acts, with the same name, were passed by the US congress in 1793 and 1850, only to be repealed in 1864?

Tuesday: Phaseolus coccineus is better known as which vegetable?

Curiosity is the lust of the mind.

Thomas Hobbes