The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: Getty Images

Iranian state television confirmed that Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, was killed following American and Israeli air strikes. Mr Khamenei, who ruled Iran for more than 30 years, was reportedly at his office when he was killed. Earlier Donald Trump said bombing would continue and repeated a call for regime change.

The Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, the supreme leader's praetorian guard, vowed to respond to his killing with the most destructive operation in its history. Mr Trump warned that, were that to happen, America would "hit them with a force that has never been seen before". Air-raid sirens rang across Israel on Sunday morning as Iran fired more ballistic missiles. Attacks on American military bases appeared to have resumed after Bahrain's government said warning sirens were triggered; the country hosts the US Navy's fifth fleet.

Ali Larijani, a senior official who might be the regime's choice for Iran's next supreme leader, said there would be continuity of governance. Iran announced 40 days of official mourning and a seven-day national holiday to commemorate the death of Mr Khamenei. Some Iranians mourned his death, while crowds of others took to the streets of Tehran and other cities to celebrate it.

Israeli officials said the strikes had also killed senior regime officials, including the commander of the IRGC, and key members of Iran's nuclear programme. Iranian media also reported that several members of Mr Khamenei's family were killed. Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, promised "thousands more targets" would be hit. Early on Sunday Israel said it had launched another wave of strikes against Iran.

At a special meeting of the UN Security Council, António Guterres, the secretary-general, condemned the attacks. He warned they risked igniting an uncontrollable chain of events "in the most volatile region of the world". At the meeting, Russia said the strikes violated international law. Marco Rubio, America's secretary of state, will speak on Sunday with his counterparts in the G7.

Hundreds of thousands of air passengers were left stranded as carriers cancelled thousands of flights across the Middle East. Huge connecting airports, including in Abu Dhabi, Dubai and Doha, were among those to ground all services. Airlines also diverted planes to avoid the skies above the region.

Iran's navy is telling ships they are not allowed through the Strait of Hormuz, according to media reports. Roughly a third of the world's seaborne oil travels via the waterway to the Persian Gulf. Analysts expect the price of a barrel to rise to $85-90 when markets open on Monday, up from $73 on Friday. On Saturday morning Mr Trump promised to "annihilate" the Iranian navy.

Photograph: USS Abraham Lincoln (CVN 72)

What will America and Israel strike next?

The range of targets that America and Israel have hit since they began attacking Iran on Saturday has been wide. But the most important bomb was the one that killed Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader. After his death, the list of targets is likely to change. In the coming hours and days America and Israel will go through a process known as "battle-damage assessment" to work out what they have destroyed, whom they have killed and which sites might need follow-up bombing.

Both countries will try to hit Iranian missile-launchers as they emerge from hidden positions, with the aim of pre-empting salvoes. If Iran succeeds in killing American personnel at military bases in the Persian Gulf, Donald Trump could intensify his campaign in response. Despite the uncertainty at the top of the Islamic regime, many days of war may still lie ahead.

Photograph: Getty Images

The threat to Gulf states

Iran wasted little time before lashing out at its Arab neighbours on Saturday. It fired missiles and drones at military bases in Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, all of which host American troops. Most of the attacks were swatted away by air defences. It caused more damage to civilian targets: drones hit Kuwait’s international airport and a residential tower in Bahrain; a luxury hotel in Dubai was set ablaze.

Gulf rulers had spent the past two months trying to convince Donald Trump not to strike Iran, fearing exactly this sort of retaliation. Oman tried to mediate talks over a nuclear deal that would prevent war. Those efforts failed. They are desperate to avoid a prolonged war, which could shatter their reputation as safe hubs for business and tourism. Some firms are already drawing up plans in case they have to evacuate staff. Yet the harder Iran hits Gulf states, the more it may end up pushing them into alignment with America.

Photograph: Imago

The war’s impact on energy prices

When Iran and Israel exchanged missiles last June, global oil prices jumped by 7%. The current conflict may have an even greater impact.

There are already reports that Iran’s Revolutionary Guard Corps are stopping ships passing through the Strait of Hormuz to the Persian Gulf. A complete closure of the waterway, through which 31% of all seaborne crude travels, could rapidly reduce supply worldwide. Meanwhile explosions have been heard on Kharg Island, Iran’s main oil-export terminal.

Analysts expect the price of a barrel to rise to $85-90 when markets open on Monday, up from $73 on Friday. Further disruption is possible. The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries may help matters by increasing production elsewhere; its members will meet on Sunday. But the longer the conflict drags on, the more likely it is to send energy markets reeling.

“I’m glad you like adverbs—I adore them; they are the only qualifications I really much respect.”

Henry James