The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: Belga/AFP via Getty Images

Scott Bessent, Donald Trump's treasury secretary, said America will temporarily ease sanctions to allow countries to buy Russian oil and petroleum currently at sea, in a bid to "promote stability in global energy markets". The authorisation will last until April 11th. Asian stockmarkets slid on Friday after Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, jumped back above $100 a barrel.

Rescue efforts got under way after an American refuelling plane crashed in Iraq. The Pentagon said that neither "hostile fire or friendly fire" was to blame. Meanwhile, a French soldier was killed by a drone attack on a military base in the Erbil region of Iraq. Elsewhere, Israel launched a fresh wave of attacks on Tehran and against Hizbullah targets in Lebanon.

In a written statement Iran's new supreme leader pledged to "avenge" his country's martyrs. Mojtaba Khamenei, son of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has not been seen in public since war began and is believed to have been injured in an American strike, possibly the same one that killed his father. Mojitaba threatened to open new fronts against America and pledged to continue the blockade of the Strait of Hormuz.

Mark Carney, Canada's prime minister, announced plans to invest an additional $25.7bn in defence and infrastructure projects in the Arctic. "We're taking full responsibility for defending our sovereignty," he said, ahead of a meeting with his German and Norwegian counterparts in Oslo on Friday. Canada has refocused attention on the Arctic following threats from Russia and Mr Trump's expansionist rhetoric.

Michelle Bowman, vice-chair of the Federal Reserve, announced that America's central bank will soon cut capital requirements for major banks. The move is part of a wider easing of restrictions that were introduced following the 2007-09 financial crisis. Wall Street banks have claimed for years that an overhaul is needed in order to boost economic growth.

A gunman who rammed a car into a synagogue in Michigan was found dead inside his vehicle. According to officials, the suspect, a naturalised Lebanese man, drove the car "with purpose" down a hallway inside the building, which houses a school. Police reportedly found explosives inside the vehicle. One security guard was injured. The synagogue confirmed that all students and staff were safe.

Smiljan Radic was awarded the Pritzker Prize, considered the most prestigious prize in architecture, for his "radical originality". The jury lauded the Chilean architect for favouring "fragility over any unwarranted claim to certainty", building structures that are "temporary, unstable, or deliberately unfinished". They include the fibreglass Serpentine Pavilion in London.

Figure of the day: 54%, the increase in profits per lawyer at the 100 largest law firms since 2019. Read about why legal rates are skyrocketing.

Photograph: Reuters

Carney and Merz share an Arctic rendezvous

Across the snowy marshes of northern Norway and Finland, some 32,500 soldiers from 14 NATO countries are currently training for Arctic warfare. The ten-day routine exercise, known as Cold Response, is usually intended as a signal to Russia alone. This year, it has a wider audience.

Donald Trump has made brazen attempts to annex Greenland, arguing that NATO allies are not doing enough to protect the Arctic. On Friday Mark Carney, Canada's prime minister, and Friedrich Merz, Germany's chancellor, will join their Norwegian counterpart on the front lines to send a clear message to America: NATO allies are stepping up.

The transatlantic alliance's power structure is shifting, too. NATO is bolstering its northern presence through the Arctic Sentry, an initiative to monitor the region's airspace and waters. Meanwhile, command of the alliance's Atlantic and Arctic headquarters is set to transfer from an American to a Briton. But now Mr Trump is tangled up in a war in the Middle East, NATO's show of strength may fail to get his attention.

Alaska
(US)
Canada
ARCTIC
OCEAN
North
Pole
Greenland
(Denmark)
Arctic Circle
Russia
Finland
Norway
Swe.
Den.
ATLANTIC
OCEAN
Britain
Poland
Germany
France
Italy
Turkey
NATO members

Photograph: Arash Khamooshi/The New York Times/Redux/eyevine

An extraordinary Quds Day in Iran

The last Friday of Ramadan normally sees big crowds gather in Iran for state-backed demonstrations against Israel. But this year Quds Day—named after the Arabic word for Jerusalem—is taking place during Israeli bombardment. The regime's new supreme leader has urged Iranians to turn out for rallies nonetheless: "The element of defeating the enemy must be the focus for all," he said.

These words were among the first heard from Mojtaba Khamenei since his ascension on Monday. He vowed to keep blocking the Strait of Hormuz and hinted at "other fronts". He also expounded on the martyrdom of his father (and predecessor), who was killed by an Israeli strike at the start of the war. Rumours still swirl about Mr Khamenei's own health: his written statement was read aloud on state television. It is not clear if he will appear on Friday to make the traditional expression of support for Palestinians. The war has already crippled aid operations in Gaza.

Photograph: AP

Trump’s popularity may be on a slippery slope

“When oil prices go up, we make a lot of money,” boasted Donald Trump this week, dismissing fears about his war’s financial fallout by noting that America is the world’s largest oil producer. By “we”, he must mean American oil companies—the country is also among the world’s largest oil exporters. For the public, the average gallon of petrol now costs over $3.50 for the first time since 2024, when Mr Trump campaigned on the Democrats’ failure to constrain prices.

That should worry him. The president has not received the patriotic bump in popularity common at the beginning of military campaigns. But his base still has his back: in a recent poll 83% of Republicans approved of his handling of Iran, and self-described “MAGA” Republicans are even more supportive. But voters hate high fuel prices, and Republicans are likelier to rely on gas-guzzling cars than more-urban Democrats. “The longer this goes, the more risk there is to the president,” says Don Bacon, a Republican congressman.

Photograph: Fairfax Media/Headpress/eyevine

Rupert Murdoch’s family saga on screen

“Dynasty: The Murdochs” acknowledges that it is not the first show inspired by the family’s story. “Succession”, a wildly popular television drama about four siblings jostling for power over their elderly father’s media conglomerate, was first conceived as a mock-documentary about Rupert Murdoch’s empire. But this is the real thing: a vivid and informed four-part Netflix series that switches between the rise of the Murdoch dynasty and the recent machinations of Mr Murdoch’s offspring to control it after his death—an eventuality he declines to acknowledge.

The result is a study in how life imitates art. “Succession”, which sparked panic in the junior Murdoch camps, fuelled the boardroom battles that “The Murdochs” details. And while their story is entertaining, in both fact and fiction, its consequences are material. As one contributor notes, “It’s a family squabble that has a huge effect on our politics and on our lives.”

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 GMT on Friday to . We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Friday: Which word links the venues for a circus performance and a boxing match?

Thursday: What is another term for someone who works as a stable hand?

Don’t play for safety. It’s the most dangerous thing in the world.

Hugh Walpole