Donald Trump said he had ordered America's navy to "shoot and kill" boats putting mines in the Strait of Hormuz, and to increase its minesweeping efforts. He reiterated that America would maintain its naval blockade until Iran makes a deal. Iran has attacked at least three ships in the waterway and said it had detained two others since Mr Trump extended the ceasefire on Tuesday.

Reuters reported that American forces had intercepted at least three Iranian-flagged tankers near India, Malaysia and Sri Lanka. One was reportedly a supertanker laden with 2m barrels of crude oil. Meanwhile, Pete Hegseth, America's secretary of war, fired his navy secretary, John Phelan. He appears to be the latest casualty in Mr Hegseth's rolling purge of America's military leadership.

A fragile ceasefire in Lebanon came under further strain. Israeli strikes killed at least five people on Wednesday, including a journalist, which Lebanon described as a war crime. Hizbullah, an Iran-backed militia in Lebanon, said it launched a drone at Israeli forces. The truce expires on Sunday but may be extended in talks between Israeli and Lebanese diplomats in Washington on Thursday.

The European Union approved a €90bn ($105bn) loan to Ukraine, and a 20th package of sanctions against Russia. Two-thirds of the loan is for defence spending. The package had been held up for months by Hungary and Slovakia, which had demanded that Ukraine repair the Druzhba pipeline, which supplies Russian oil to Europe via Ukraine. It finished repairs on Tuesday.

Lockheed Martin, an American defence colossus, reported disappointing first-quarter results. Profits fell by 13%, compared with the same period last year, while sales remained flat. Inflation and Mr Trump's tariffs have weighed on growth, despite soaring demand for weapons in Europe and the Middle East. But Lockheed emphasised it has recently signed several agreements, including a $4.7bn contract to sell Patriot interceptors to America.

L'Oréal, the world's largest cosmetics group, reported its best quarterly sales in two years. A surge in demand from China and the "lipstick effect"—the tendency to spend on small indulgences in tough times—boosted revenues to €12.2bn ($14.2bn), up 3.6% from the same period last year. L'Oréal said wider economic turmoil triggered by conflict in the Middle East had not deterred shoppers.

France's weather-forecasting office alerted the police to suspicious temperature recordings that coincided with heavy betting on Polymarket, a prediction market. Traders placed $1.4m worth of bets on temperatures at Charles de Gaulle International Airport—far more than normal for betting on Paris temperature readings. On April 6th and 15th the airport's readings spiked in the evening; the forecasting office thinks they were tampered with.

How long can the Iran ceasefire last?

It is becoming a familiar scene: a ticking clock, a threat of catastrophic war, a diplomatic scramble—and then, a last-minute reprieve. On Tuesday Donald Trump extended the ceasefire with Iran indefinitely, retreating again from his threats to bomb its power plants.

Both sides believe they have the upper hand. Mr Trump maintains his naval blockade is crushing cash-strapped Iran. Iran will probably have to start cutting oil production within days as storage fills; a prolonged closure of its ports will also drive up prices of food and other essentials. But Iran's regime believes that its own maritime stranglehold can force America to desist. Oil markets were unimpressed with the extended truce: the price of Brent crude stuck around $100 a barrel. Mr Trump needs the strait open before high petrol prices sink the Republicans' prospects in November's midterm elections. Both sides fear a resumption in fighting. Yet while each believes it is winning, neither wants to come to the negotiating table.

The Indian art of wooing women

For a long time the female voter was an afterthought in Indian politics. Now, when electoral turnout among women often exceeds that of men, politicians have started to see them as a powerful voting bloc. In West Bengal and Tamil Nadu, which hold elections on Thursday, strategists are betting that cash is the way to get their support.

In West Bengal the chief minister, Mamata Banerjee, is campaigning on the popularity of her flagship cash-transfer scheme for women. Tamil Nadu's chief minister, M.K. Stalin, has promised that if he's re-elected he will double the state's cash benefit to women to around $20 per month. These are examples of a striking trend: at least 16 of India's 28 states run schemes that pay women cash—up from just a handful in 2022. Around half of these states run revenue deficits; such payments add to the strain. Women voters are now impossible to ignore. They are also expensive to please.

Is Intel back?

Few people expect Intel's first-quarter results, which will be reported on Thursday, to be spectacular. Analysts expect America's troubled semiconductor giant to report a 1.9% decrease in revenue year on year, to $12.4bn. Yet its share price has risen by more than 250% over the past year—far exceeding the rise in the tech-heavy NASDAQ index.

Recent deals have lifted investors' confidence. In August last year the American government took a 10% stake. Then Nvidia, the world's largest chip designer, invested $5bn. Intel also announced it was partnering with Elon Musk, a tech mogul, to build a semiconductor factory in Texas, although details are scarce.

The demand for CPUs, a type of chip that Intel produces in large quantities, is expected to rise considerably as artificial-intelligence models handle increasingly complex tasks—so-called "agentic AI". Morgan Stanley, an investment bank, estimates that this could add around $45bn to the annual value of the market by 2030.

A deal of Paramount importance

On Thursday Warner Bros Discovery's shareholders approved the company's takeover by Paramount, a much smaller Hollywood rival controlled by the Ellisons, who made their fortune in tech, despite a plot to derail the $111bn deal. Earlier this month more than 1,400 actors and filmmakers signed a letter arguing that it would "consolidate an already concentrated media landscape".

The acquisition is likely to face legal challenges on antitrust grounds. "WarnerMount" has a decent defence. Combining the two century-old studios is bound to result in job losses, and may lead to fewer productions (the Ellisons have promised to ramp up film-making but they will need to slash costs to pay down debt from the highly leveraged takeover). Yet at the moment, Warner is struggling to compete with streaming giants such as Netflix, Disney and Amazon. Paramount, smaller still, is probably doomed without a partner. Merging Hollywood's old studios may be better for competition than letting them wither.

Data bite: Corporate America shrugs off global tumult

Despite the shock of Donald Trump's trade war, and now a real one in the Gulf, earnings expectations for American firms are through the roof. Aggregate earnings for the S&P 500 rose by an estimated 19% in the first quarter, year on year. Projections for earnings growth for the next 12 months are 24% higher than a year ago. That would beat even the profit bonanza that followed the corporate-tax cuts of Mr Trump's first term. AI is driving some of the windfall. But even outside big tech, earnings are set to increase by 16% in 2026—a testament to American innovation, especially in AI and pharmaceuticals, which remains the envy of the world.
