Tesla's shares rose about 4% after the electric-vehicle maker reported first-quarter profit of $477m, up about 17% from a year earlier. However, profits missed expectations and remain far below 2022 levels. Car sales disappointed as competition intensified. The company is shifting focus to self-driving taxis and humanoid robots, but these have yet to generate meaningful revenue.

Iran's top negotiator, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, said reopening the Strait of Hormuz was "not possible" while America maintains a naval blockade. Iran attacked at least three ships in the strait, a day after Donald Trump said he would extend a ceasefire until peace talks are concluded. Iran's navy said it had detained two vessels for "endangering maritime security".

A fragile ceasefire in Lebanon came under further strain. At least four people were killed in Israeli strikes in southern Lebanon on Wednesday, according to state media; Hizbullah said it launched a drone at Israeli forces. The clashes come a day before Israeli and Lebanese diplomats meet for a second round of talks in Washington, where Lebanon will push to extend the American-brokered truce due to expire on Sunday.

Spirit Airlines is reportedly in talks with the Trump administration to secure a federal loan of up to $500m. Support could include equity warrants, potentially giving the government a majority stake, according to the Financial Times. The airline, in the midst of its second bankruptcy in two years, is struggling with intense competition and a surge in fuel prices.

Boeing reported a net loss of $7m in its first-quarter earnings, compared with losses of $31m in the same period last year. Commercial-jet sales rose following the partial lifting of a production cap by American regulators, which had been imposed after a door malfunctioned mid-flight in 2024. Defence revenues, spurred by the Iran war, grew by 21%. The division's order backlog grew to a record $86bn.

Switzerland unveiled banking reforms that would require UBS, the country's biggest lender, to add roughly $20bn to its capital buffers. The proposals, triggered by the collapse of Credit Suisse, a rival that UBS rescued, mandate full capital backing for UBS's foreign operations. UBS called the reforms "extreme" and warned they would have "far-reaching consequences" for the Swiss economy.

Justin Sun, a crypto billionaire, sued World Liberty Financial, a crypto venture backed by Mr Trump's family. In a federal suit filed in California, he accused the firm of illegally taking control of tokens he had bought that were once valued at $1bn and of pressuring him to invest more. Mr Sun was one of the project's biggest early backers. World Liberty denies wrongdoing.

Britain’s laboured economy

On Wednesday Britain released consumer price index data for March. The energy shock caused by war in Iran drove annual inflation up to 3.3%, from 3% in February. But much of the pain is yet to come. The government’s energy price cap is expected to rise in July. Households also face steeper prices for other goods and services when businesses pass down higher operating costs.

The labour market offers little comfort. Britain’s unemployment rate unexpectedly fell to 4.9% in the three months to February, down from 5.2% in the three before that. But this is partly due to the method of counting: fewer people are actively seeking work, and so have fallen out of the figures. Meanwhile the number of payrolled employees has fallen, wage growth is weaker and hiring has slowed. The timing is bad for the Labour Party, which faces an uphill fight in local elections on May 7th.

Why China’s exports will keep on rising

China’s exports are booming despite America’s trade war and conflict in the Middle East. In the first three months of 2026, shipments rose by nearly 15% year on year, extending a surge that pushed the trade surplus to record levels in 2025. The Economist’s new analysis of trade data shows why.

Exports to America have fallen sharply, but sales to other countries have soared, more than offsetting the loss. Most of the increase reflects genuine new demand, especially in Asia and Europe, not simply rerouting through third countries. China is also exporting different goods—fewer consumer products, and more components, machinery and high-tech parts—boosted by the AI boom. Cheap prices, helped by weak domestic demand, keep exports competitive.

China is also better placed than many Asian rivals to weather the Iran war. Its reliance on domestic coal shields firms from the oil-price shock. And higher petrol prices are pushing consumers towards electric vehicles, lifting demand in Japan, South Korea and India.

Battle of the bulging order books

America's big "prime" defence companies are benefiting from a more violent world. On Tuesday GE Aerospace, Northrop Grumman and RTX reported a surge in orders in first-quarter results; Lockheed Martin reports on Thursday. Armed forces on both sides of the Atlantic need to fill magazines depleted by war in Ukraine, and Europe is tooling up to reduce its reliance on America. Israel and America have burned through munitions in Iran, while beleaguered Gulf states have used up interceptors.

But meeting the demand requires investment that is often slow to pay off. Lockheed needs four years to increase annual production of its PAC-3 interceptors to 2,000, for example. America fired around 400 in the first 16 days of the Iran war. It is a similar story for RTX's Tomahawk missiles. And investors worry about a clique of agile "neo-primes", including Anduril, Palantir and SpaceX, fighting for a growing share of defence budgets. Legacy armsmakers face a tough battle.
