

Catch up: Police raid South Korean president's office; Syria's interim prime minister

South Korean police raided the office of the president, Yoon Suk Yeol; they also arrested the police chief. Mr Yoon is under investigation for insurrection and banned from leaving the country following his short-lived coup attempt. He is expected to face a second impeachment vote on Saturday. On Tuesday Kim Yong-hyun, a former defence minister arrested over his involvement, tried to take his own life.

The Israel Defence Forces said it carried out 480 strikes on Syria in 48 hours, bombing targets in several cities, including the capital Damascus, and destroying up to 80% of the country's military capabilities. Syria's navy was sunk overnight on Tuesday. Despite protests from the UN, the IDF also deployed troops to create a "sterile defence zone" between the two countries.

The Biden administration urged Hayat Tahrir al-Sham, the Islamist group that toppled Bashar al-Assad in Syria, not to claim automatic leadership and instead to establish an inclusive transitional government, reported Reuters. On Tuesday HTS appointed Muhammed al-Bashir, a former head of the Syrian Salvation Government, a rebel-led group, as caretaker prime minister. But Abu Muhammad al-Jolani, HTS's leader, still pulls the strings.

The Israel Defence Forces are creating a “sterile defence zone” in southern Syria, according to Israel Katz, the defence minister. Mr Katz confirmed that the IDF had launched dozens of strikes across Syria in recent days, destroying Syria's navy, but denied that it was advancing towards Damascus. The UN condemned Israel's action.

Luigi Mangione refused to be extradited to New York, where he is charged with the murder of Brian Thompson, UnitedHealthcare's chief executive. Denied bail, he will remain jailed in Pennsylvania—where he was recognised and arrested on Monday—until the challenge is resolved. That could take weeks. Police recovered a manifesto that, according to an official, revealed “ill will toward corporate America”.

General Motors ended its expensive foray into robotaxis, announcing that it would shift the focus of Cruise, its autonomous-vehicle outfit, towards helping human drivers. America's largest carmaker said it was bowing both to the cost of scaling up production and to fierce competition among firms developing autonomous taxis. GM has already lowered its ambitions to build more electric vehicles, which Americans shun.

A judge in Oregon blocked a proposed \$25bn merger between Kroger and Albertsons, two big American grocery chains. America's Federal Trade Commission, a trustbuster, argued that the deal would reduce competition that helps keep prices in check. Kroger insisted that the merger would lower prices at Albertsons and allow the stores to compete with giants such as Walmart and Amazon.

Trouble might be brewing for your morning cup of coffee. The price of arabica beans, which account for most of global production, hit $3.44 per pound—up by 80% in 2024. Brazil and Vietnam, the world's biggest producers, have suffered from disruption due to bad weather, which has compounded supply issues created by rising demand. Figure of the day: 20%, the share of adults in rich countries with maths and reading skills no better than a primary-school pupil. Read the full story.

America's lingering inflation

Economists often refer to the final push to eliminate excess inflation in America as the “last mile”. It is taking a long time to run it. The latest figures, due on Wednesday, are expected to show that consumer prices in November rose by 0.3% from a month earlier, the fastest monthly increase since April. Sticky inflation will fuel debate about whether the Federal Reserve should slow its interest-rate cuts to get prices under control.

The details of the data may be a little more reassuring. They will probably show that the increase in core prices—which strip out volatile food and energy costs—has remained stable, with no acceleration, for the past four months. That would probably keep the Fed on track to cut rates by another quarter-point at its meeting next week. But it is still too soon to declare victory over inflation in America, especially with Donald Trump mulling policies, from tariffs to rate cuts, that will push prices upward.

The push to rule Syria

Bashar al-Assad's regime is gone and a new government is being pulled together in Damascus, but Syria's civil war is not over. In the north of the country, a Turkish proxy group is advancing against the Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF), the predominantly Kurdish militia that helped America bring down the Islamic State caliphate. Since early December, the Syrian National Army (SNA), a rebel force armed by Turkey, has captured the towns of Manbij and Tel Rifaat, which had been under Kurdish control since 2016.

The SNA, backed by Turkish drones, is reportedly marching towards Kobani, a Kurdish town that survived a siege by IS nearly a decade ago. Over the past few months, Turkey's president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, has threatened a new offensive against the Kurds, designed to broaden the "safe zone" Turkey has carved out. Through the SNA, he appears to have launched one already.

Lula's emergency brain surgery

President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil is recovering after emergency brain surgery in São Paulo on Monday. Since an accident in October, Lula, as he is known, has avoided long-haul flights. His doctors said that the bleeding in his skull was nothing out of the ordinary.

Still, the episode raises serious questions about Lula's long-term ability to lead. At 79, he is the oldest sitting president in Brazil's history. But he is also the country's most popular national politician and is expected to run again in 2026. The former trade-union leader and icon of Latin America's left has no obvious successor. His vice-president Geraldo Alckmin, a 72-year-old moderate from a different party, will stand in for him as he recovers. But even once Lula returns to work next week, doubts over his fitness for office will hang over his political future.

Rain on Macy's parade

A fortnight after its annual Thanksgiving parade, Macy's might not see another rally for a while—its stock is down 15% so far this year, even as the broader market has moved up. The New York-based chain of department stores, which reports earnings on Wednesday, has faced several setbacks: talks to take the company private have stalled; an employee was found to have hidden $154m in delivery expenses; and activist investors want it to hive off its valuable real estate and cut capital spending.

But the drama is a distraction from a more fundamental problem: Americans are increasingly shopping online or at big-box retailers—and not at department stores. Analysts at JPMorgan, a bank, predict that Macy's revenues will drop 3.8% in the 2024 financial year. Pressure is piling on Tony Spring, who was brought in as CEO in February, to deliver on his plan to steer the retailer back to growth.

No surprises for the 2034 World Cup

On Wednesday FIFA will reveal that its men's World Cup in 2034 is to be held in Saudi Arabia. Some feel that football's global governing body has steered the process too much. It likes to jump around the world: America will host in 2026, and Spain, Portugal and Morocco will share the event in 2030 (with a swing through South America to mark the centenary of the first competition in Uruguay). In effect that limited the 2034 bid to countries in Asia and Oceania.

In October 2023, FIFA suddenly announced that potential hosts needed to declare their interest by the end of that month. Saudi Arabia was ready. Their only serious rival, Australia, was not. That made a second winter World Cup all but certain. The excitement of the football (particularly the final) at the Qatar tournament in 2022 was tainted by the deaths of migrant construction workers, sky-high carbon emissions and the host's intolerance of gay fans. Returning to the region in 2034 will court all the same controversies.
