

Catch up: Hamas's political leader killed; Fed holds rates steady

Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas's political leader, was killed in a “Zionist raid on his residence” in Tehran, according to the Palestinian militant group. Mr Haniyeh was in the Iranian capital for the inauguration of Iran's president on Tuesday. Earlier the Israel Defence Forces struck a Hizbullah stronghold in a suburb of Beirut, Lebanon's capital, reportedly killing Fuad Shukr, the Shia militia's “most senior” commander. Israel blames Hizbullah for a rocket attack that killed 12 children in the Israel-controlled Golan Heights on July 27th. The group denies firing the rocket.

America's Federal Reserve continued to hold rates at the benchmark target range of between 5.25-5.5%—the highest in 23 years, and unchanged since last July—but said there had been “further progress” towards its inflation target of 2%. Jerome Powell, the central bank's chairman, signalled that it was “moving closer” to cutting rates. This may happen as soon as the next meeting in mid-September.

Boeing, one of the world's two biggest plane makers, named Kelly Ortberg as its new boss. He will take over from Dave Calhoun on August 8th. A high-profile incident in January, when a 737 MAX plane shed a door mid-flight, coupled with Boeing's agreement to plead guilty to fraud in connection with two deadly crashes in 2018 and 2019, has shaken the confidence of passengers and investors alike.

Russia launched one of the largest drone attacks on Ukraine since the beginning of the war. The head of the military administration in Kyiv, Serhiy Popko, said that air-defence systems destroyed more than 40 drones in the capital city and surrounding areas. Mr Popko said that no casualties had been reported so far. Some 89 drones in total were shot down across the country.

Ed Bastian, the boss of Delta, one of America's biggest airlines, said that the firm lost $500m because of disruption caused by the CrowdStrike outage on July 19th. A failed update to the cyber-security firm's software caused Microsoft computers around the world to crash, leading to thousands of flights being cancelled. Mr Bastian said that the firm will take legal action against CrowdStrike and Microsoft.

KKR, an American private-equity giant, said that its adjusted net income rose to $971.9m in the second quarter of 2024, a 49% increase on the same period last year. The firm's bumper earnings, which beat most analysts' expectations, were largely driven by selling shares in tech and oil firms. KKR aims to control $1trn-worth of assets within the next five years.

California's Park Fire grew to almost 390,000 acres on Wednesday, making it the fifth largest in the American state's history. The blaze started last week near Chico, after a man allegedly pushed a burning car into a gully; he has been charged with arson. Extreme heat and dry conditions probably worsened the spread. Authorities in neighbouring Nevada declared an air-quality emergency after smoke crossed state lines.

What a strike in Tehran means for Gaza

Just days ago it seemed as if Israel and Hamas were finally growing close to a ceasefire in Gaza. Now the leader of Hamas is dead, assassinated by a presumed Israeli strike in Tehran on July 31st. (Israel has not commented on the attack.) Ismail Haniyeh's death will halt ceasefire talks, at least temporarily. Hamas will have to choose a new leader; among the frontrunners is Khaled Meshaal, who led the group until 2017.

Whoever takes the job will inherit Mr Haniyeh's dilemma. Most Gazans are desperate for a ceasefire. They are exhausted from ten months of war, living in squalid tent camps after being displaced multiple times. Even the Hamas rank-and-file is pushing for a truce. One man is not, though: Yahya Sinwar, the group's leader in Gaza. His refusal to make a deal led to frequent quarrels with Mr Haniyeh. The next Hamas chief will have to overcome his objections—and then those of Binyamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister, who has also spent months obstructing a ceasefire.

The Bank of England's close call

The Bank of England may cut interest rates for the first time in years when its Monetary Policy Committee meets on Thursday. Financial markets see 60:40 odds of a 0.25 percentage point cut; 78% of City forecasters anticipate a decrease.

The decision will be tough because Britain's economy is sending mixed signals. Annual consumer-price inflation has returned to the BOE's target rate of 2%. But much of the recent decline reflects volatile food and energy prices. Core inflation, which excludes those categories, is 3.5%. Services inflation, which many economists consider a better measure of underlying inflation pressure, is higher still at 5.7%. That said, the unemployment rate has risen by 0.6 percentage points this year to 4.4%. A weaker labour market should eventually slow inflation.

Regardless of how the bank parses the data this time, a rate cut looks imminent. Markets are nearly certain that if the committee holds off in August, it will make its move in September.

Protests spread across Africa

Nigerians suffering from the country's economic crisis have taken inspiration from recent protests in Kenya, which sank an unpopular tax bill. On Thursday demonstrations are set to begin across Nigeria. The situation in sub-Saharan Africa's second-largest economy is dire. Panicked drivers are stockpiling petrol and black-marketeers are reselling it for double the price. Shops are locking up. The Senate has been called back from recess for an emergency meeting.

The army warns that it will not “allow the nation to spiral out of control”. In Kenya's protests dozens were killed. In unrest in Uganda last week 104 people were arrested. Courts in Ghana have disallowed planned protests there. The memory of the 2020 #EndSARS movement, which ended with the army firing live rounds at protesters in Lagos, the most populous state, still haunts Nigerians. The government has rushed to raise the minimum wage, introduce grants for young people and suspend import duties on essentials. But food-price inflation has already reached record highs. Is it too little too late?

Poland and Germany's difficult history

On Thursday Poland's capital will come to a standstill to mark the 80th anniversary of the Warsaw Uprising, in which residents tried to oust the occupying Germans. The Nazis razed Warsaw in retaliation; some 15,000 insurgents and 250,000 civilians were killed. The devastation is often cited in Polish reparation claims to Germany over the second world war. In 2022 the then-ruling Law and Justice party demanded €1.3trn ($1.4trn). Germany said it would not pay; relations reached a low point.

Since the pro-European government of Donald Tusk took over in December, Poland has been mending relations with its largest trade partner and ally in helping Ukraine. In July Mr Tusk hosted Olaf Scholz, Germany's chancellor, for intergovernmental talks—a first since 2018. Mr Scholz offered support for survivors of the Nazi occupation in Poland. This week Germany's president, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, will attend joint commemorations, as the neighbours seek to put a dark history, as well as recent frictions, behind them.

A talk show in TikTok times

© Prime Video

Gen Z are watching TikTok instead of television. Less than half of young people in Britain regularly tune in to broadcast TV.

Meanwhile, on social media amateur anchors deliver the news. In 2023 nearly a third of Americans aged between 18 and 29 regularly got their news on TikTok, according to a poll by Pew Research Centre.

“Influenced”, released on Prime Video on Thursday, is a talk show that seeks to straddle social media and television. The co-hosts are five online influencers with more than 5m fans between them on TikTok. The 30-minute episodes will tackle topics ranging from plastic surgery to mental health. One on work-life balance covers “side hustles” that generate income alongside a nine-to-five job.

“Are you scrolling looking for something to watch?” ask the hosts on social media, as they seek to lure viewers to the new show.

Prime, which is owned by Amazon, hopes that Gen-Zers will, at least for a while, stop scrolling and start streaming.
