

Catch up: Biden promises Ukraine military aid; world leaders mourn Carter

President Joe Biden promised Ukraine nearly $2.5bn-worth of military aid. Some $1.25bn-worth will come from America's stock, meaning supplies could reach the battlefield quickly; the rest could take longer to arrive. Mr Biden said he would work "relentlessly" to "strengthen Ukraine's position" before leaving office in January. Many fear his successor, Donald Trump, will cut aid to Ukraine.

Every living American president offered fond recollections of their predecessor, Jimmy Carter, who died aged 100 on Sunday. Numerous world leaders also praised the former president's efforts to promote peace and democracy. Mr Carter was president between 1977 and 1981. His foreign-policy achievements included presiding over the Camp David Accords between Egypt and Israel in 1978. He won the Nobel peace prize in 2002.

South Korea ordered a safety inspection of the country's airlines after a plane crash killed 179 people. The aeroplane, operated by Jeju Air, burst into flames when it hit a wall while landing at Muan

International Airport in the country's south. Investigators said they were looking into a possible bird strike as the cause for the crash.

Japan's purchasing-managers index, an industry survey, rose from 49.0 in November to 49.6 in December. A reading above 50 represents growth. Meanwhile South Korea's seasonally-adjusted factory output for November fell by 0.7% compared with the previous month. The larger-than-expected drop was the result of weakening exports and low business confidence caused by geopolitical uncertainty.

Afghanistan's economic ministry threatened to shut down NGOs that employ women. The Taliban, the ruling militant group, made a similar threat two years ago, claiming that some employees did not wear proper Islamic dress. Since regaining power in August 2021, it has curtailed women's rights, limiting their ability to work, receive an education, practice their religion or enjoy public spaces.

Zoran Milanovic, Croatia's leftist president, secured nearly 50% of the vote in the first round of presidential elections, making him the overwhelming favourite in next month's run-off against Dragan Primorac. Mr Primorac is the candidate of the centre-right Croatian Democratic Union, which leads the government. Although the position is mostly ceremonial, Croatia's president has a say in foreign policy.

Russia promised to retaliate after Telegram, a messaging app, blocked several Russian state-media channels in a handful of European countries, including France and Italy. The Kremlin called the decision "an act of censorship". The EU has already banned many Russian state-media outlets from broadcasting within the bloc over concerns about disinformation. Neither Telegram or the EU has commented about the new restrictions.

What can America expect from Donald Trump?

Until January 2nd we are looking ahead to next year's big stories. Today, what will shape the United States and the rest of the Americas?

Donald Trump returns to the presidency in January with Republican majorities in both the Senate and House of Representatives, clearing the way for him to pass legislation. A giant tax-cutting bill is on the cards. But the majorities are slim, especially in the House, and he will probably act without Congress, too. Mr Trump could invoke national-security authority to implement sweeping tariffs on China and use executive orders to try to “shut down” the southern border and limit asylum. And he will be tempted to seek retribution against his political enemies, perhaps through the Justice Department.

Mr Trump's victory entrenches his ideological transformation of the party into one dominated by a nativist, protectionist wing, sceptical of military adventurism. J.D. Vance, the new vice-president, aged 40, is the heir-apparent to the Make America Great Again movement, provided he can stay in Mr Trump's good graces. Wherever Mr Trump takes America in the next four years will be felt for decades to come.

What does a Trump presidency mean for Latin America?

Donald Trump gave Latin America a hard time the first time he occupied the White House. It can expect an even harder one in 2025. Cracking down on illegal immigration, trade imbalances and drugs will be priorities during his presidency. The vast majority of the millions of people Mr Trump says he wants to deport are Latin Americans. Their countries would struggle to absorb them, and the loss of remittances would hurt their economies.

A trade war may loom with Mexico—although given North America's economic integration, Mr Trump may consider a review of the United States-Mexico-Canada free-trade agreement, due in 2026, as a chance to make deals. The president-elect has also promised to stem the influx into the United States of fentanyl, a drug made by gangs in Mexico. Mr Trump may not actually bomb drug laboratories operated by gangs, as he has suggested, but he will probably take a more muscular approach to security threats from Mexico than have previous administrations.

What now for the Democrats?

In blazing the Republicans' path back to the White House, Donald Trump has sparked a frenzy of finger-pointing, and even some soul-searching, within the Democratic Party. There is no agreement yet on policy or message. Does the Democrats' winning path lie further left, or towards the centre? The pro-labour economic populism of the party's leftists may appeal to working-class voters who defected to Mr Trump, but those same people are alienated by leftist positions on policing, illegal immigration and transgender rights.

The Democrats can at least console themselves that they have a strong generation of rising politicians who are, at last, free to compete to set the party's direction. The buzz in 2025 will be loudest about governors who boast records of pragmatic decision-making—people such as Gretchen Whitmer of Michigan and Josh Shapiro of Pennsylvania, both battleground states, and Andy Beshear of Kentucky, a firmly red one.

Will the “iron-fist” model spread in Latin America?

Enthusiasm for a ruthless approach to crime is growing in Latin America, thanks in part to the “iron-fist” model of Nayib Bukele. Since declaring a state of emergency in 2022 El Salvador’s president has thrown 80,000 people, nearly 2% of the population, into jail. Human-rights groups say torture in prison is common. Most Salvadoreans seem not to mind: homicides have plummeted and Mr Bukele was re-elected by a landslide in 2024.

In 2025 concerns about crime will shape presidential elections in Ecuador, where cities have lately joined the ranks of the world’s most violent, and in Chile, where the murder rate has increased since 2019 to surpass that of the United States. Daniel Noboa, Ecuador’s president, who is running for re-election, has sent the army and police into the streets to tackle gang violence. He will probably pledge to clamp down harder. Chile, which elected Gabriel Boric, a youthful leftist, in 2021, could turn towards candidates promising to be tough on crime. If they do, other leaders will surely take notice.
