

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Pope Leo XIV emphasised the need to “build bridges with dialogue” in his first speech as pontiff. Leo, formerly Cardinal Robert Prevost, is the first American to be chosen as pope. He is considered a moderate—not as progressive as the late Pope Francis, but outspoken on his commitment to migrants and the poor. Despite Leo’s past criticism of Donald Trump’s aggressive nationalism, the president welcomed the appointment.

Mr Trump also unveiled a trade deal alongside Sir Keir Starmer, Britain’s prime minister. There was no movement on America’s broad 10% levy on British imports, which the president said would raise $6bn. But tariffs on some British cars and steel will be reduced. Howard Lutnick, America’s commerce secretary, boasted of a $10bn order of Boeing aircraft by an unnamed British airline.

India said it had foiled Pakistan’s attempts to hit three military bases. Blasts were reported in the city of Jammu in Indian-administered Kashmir, amid a blackout across the region. Pakistan denied it was behind the attack. Meanwhile, J.D. Vance said rising tensions between the countries was “fundamentally none of our business”. America’s vice-president said his country would encourage de-escalation, but not get involved in a war.

The value of China’s exports rose by 8% year on year in April, despite shipments to America falling by 21% because of Mr Trump’s tariffs. According to customs data, the surge was driven by greater exports to South-East Asia, which increased by 21%, and the EU, up 8%. Officials from America and China will meet this weekend for trade talks.

Mr Trump called for a “30-day unconditional ceasefire” between Russia and Ukraine, threatening more sanctions if it were violated. His social-media post followed a call with Volodymyr Zelensky. Ukraine’s president said his country was ready for talks with Russia in “any format” if the Kremlin committed to a ceasefire.

The European Union revealed plans for retaliatory tariffs on roughly $100bn of American exports. Last month America imposed levies of 20% on most of the EU’s exports, before lowering the rate to 10% for a negotiating period lasting until July 8th. The measures could come into effect if the two parties fail to reach a deal.

Scientists using artificial intelligence to study photographs of people’s faces—including selfies—said they could reliably predict cancer survival rates. In a study in the Lancet, researchers used a programme called FaceAge to estimate subjects’ “biological age”. On average, the facial age of a cancer sufferer was around five years higher than their “chronological age”. Oncologists must often rely on subjective judgments to estimate survival chances.

Figure of the day: 31%, the share of Gen Xers—those born between 1965 and 1980—who say they are “not very happy” or “not happy at all”, according to a recent poll. Read the full story.

The tariff shock to China's economy

China, the world's biggest exporter, has suffered some seismic trade shocks. In the worst month of the Asian financial crisis of 1997-98 exports fell by 17% year on year. During the global financial crisis of 2007-09 they dropped by 28%. And when the covid-19 pandemic struck in 2020 they tumbled by an astonishing 44%.

How will the trade quake caused by Donald Trump's tariffs compare with these? Official figures released on Friday showed that Chinese exports remained resilient in April, growing by 8.1% compared with the previous year. Unlike a pandemic or financial crisis, America's tariffs have disrupted China's trade with only one country, albeit the world's biggest market. And in the first nine days of April exporters rushed to ship as much as possible before the levies came into effect. The figures may be far worse in May. But on Saturday America's treasury secretary, Scott Bessent, will meet China's economy tsar, He Lifeng, in Geneva to talk about de-escalating the conflict. Their talks could lessen the tariff shock before official data fully register it.

Putin's big parade

On Friday Russia marks the 80th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany. The Kremlin says nearly 30 foreign leaders will attend festivities in Moscow, including China's Xi Jinping and Brazil's Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva. Annual Victory Day parades are meant to show Russia's strength, replete with heavy weaponry such as tanks and air-defence systems. Yet in recent years they have largely lacked such hardware; critical equipment has been needed in Ukraine, where much has been destroyed. The 2024 parade featured just one tank—a T-34 from the second world war.

This year there may be more to show off: Russia has greatly expanded military production over the past 18 months or so. Mr Putin is keen to make sure the show runs smoothly. The Kremlin announced a unilateral ceasefire with Ukraine between May 8th and 11th. Ukraine's president, Volodymyr Zelensky, dismissed the move as a cynical ploy to create a "pleasant atmosphere" for the parade.

France and Poland sign a defence treaty

The occasion will be heavy with symbolism. To mark Europe Day France's president, Emmanuel Macron, will host Donald Tusk, Poland's prime minister, in Nancy—a north-eastern city built mostly by a dethroned Polish monarch in the 18th century. The two countries will sign an agreement on military and economic co-operation that has been months in the making.

Mr Macron argues that Europe must unite to defend itself. (France has similar deals with Germany, Italy and Spain, and a narrower defence pact with Britain.) The agreement may also pave the way for lucrative arms deals: French companies are bidding for helicopter, aircraft and submarine contracts in Poland, NATO's largest defence spender as a share of GDP.

Poland is eager for security guarantees from European allies as America's commitment to the continent weakens. Polish leaders have expressed hopes that France will bring their country under its nuclear umbrella. The Nancy deal won't give it that assurance, but it is a step to upgrading ties.

A bumpy ride for British Airways' owner

International Airlines Group, the parent company of British Airways, Iberia and Aer Lingus, had a strong 2024. Its revenues and profits comfortably exceeded analysts' forecasts. First-quarter results, published on Friday, may signal turbulence ahead.

Much of IAG's success has been based on strong demand for transatlantic flights. But Donald Trump's trade war has dented consumer confidence and lowered bookings. When Mr Trump unveiled his plans, IAG's share price dropped. It has since recovered, but is still far below highs of earlier this year. Over the coming year fears of recession in America—IAG's most profitable market—could drag bookings down further.

There are positive developments, too. Lower fuel prices, a boon for airlines, are partly a consequence of tariff uncertainty. But savings there are unlikely to offset the losses IAG will face elsewhere. The firm is in for a bumpy ride.

Marcella's secret sauce

Marcella Hazan's most famous recipe is her simplest. You halve an onion and simmer it with a can of tomatoes, a blob of butter and a pinch of salt. Her instructions, from "The Classic Italian Cook Book", published in 1973, are bare-bones but precise; the results are revelatory. Hazan's no-nonsense books taught Americans how to cook Italian food beyond spaghetti and meatballs.

"Marcella", a documentary in cinemas in America starting Friday, interviews chefs, journalists and family members to explore the life and impact of Hazan, who died in 2013. A trained scientist, she taught herself to cook upon arriving in New York. She began teaching small groups in her apartment. Books and popular classes in Italy followed. "Simple is not easy," Hazan said frequently of her food; the same applies to her brand. The film considers the less savoury sides of "Marcella Inc"—and how the prickly chain-smoking nonna, whose English was never good enough for a television show, nonetheless charmed her way into American kitchens.

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each day this week. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and, as important, tell us the connecting theme. Email your responses (and include mention of your home city and country) by 1700 GMT on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick randomly from those with the right answers and crown three winners on Saturday.

Friday: In which film did Gene Hackman win his first Oscar?

Thursday: Which Shakespeare play features the line “Cry ‘Havoc!’ and let slip the dogs of war”?
