

Catch up: Trump's cabinet picks; the Archbishop of Canterbury resigns

Donald Trump reportedly picked Kristi Noem (pictured), the governor of South Dakota and a loyal defender of the president-elect, as his homeland security secretary, overseeing immigration. Stephen Miller, who crafted Mr Trump's immigration policy during his first term, will probably be named deputy chief of staff. Mr Trump is also expected to tap Marco Rubio, a senator for Florida, as secretary of state and Mike Waltz as his national security adviser. Mr Waltz is sceptical of American support for Ukraine.

Justin Welby, the Archbishop of Canterbury (the most senior bishop in the Church of England), resigned over his handling of an abuse scandal. A report revealed that Mr Welby did not follow up on allegations brought to him in 2013 about a man associated with the church who abused more than 100 boys over several decades. Archbishop Welby came under intense pressure from members of the church to step down.

Germany will hold an early election on February 23rd. The ruling Social Democrats and the main opposition party, the Christian Democratic Union, agreed to the date after days of quarrelling. Olaf Scholz, the chancellor, had originally proposed holding elections in March; the CDU preferred an earlier date to avoid uncertainty. Germany's coalition government collapsed last week after Mr Scholz sacked his finance minister.

North Korea ratified a defence treaty with Russia which commits each country to “immediately provide military and other assistance” if the other is at war. The countries' leaders, Kim Jong Un and Vladimir Putin, agreed the deal at a summit in June. Last month North Korea sent an estimated 11,000 troops to help Russia wage war against Ukraine.

Police said that a driver who crashed into a crowd near a stadium in Zhuhai, a town in southern China, on Monday is in a coma in hospital. The incident killed at least 35 people and injured 43 more. China has seen a surge of public attacks in recent months; in September a man stabbed several people at a supermarket in Shanghai.

Israel said it allowed more aid lorries to enter northern Gaza ahead of an American deadline to improve humanitarian access or face restrictions on shipments of weapons. The UN's aid agency for Palestinians, UNRWA, had warned that Gaza is on the brink of famine, with the amount of aid entering the enclave at its lowest level in a year.

Shell won an appeal against a climate ruling that had called on it to dramatically cut its carbon emissions. In 2021 a Dutch court said that the British oil giant must reduce its emissions by 45% by 2030, compared with 2019 levels. But an appeals court in The Hague ruled there is “insufficient” scientific consensus on whether a company should adopt such a “specific reduction percentage”.

China's growing military strength

The biennial Zhuhai air show opened in China on Tuesday. The six-day event is an opportunity for the People's Liberation Army to show off its kit in the 75th year of the People's Republic of China. This year's star is the J-35A, a stealth fighter jet that bears a striking resemblance to America's F-35. It is the latest indication that China's armed forces are growing in size and sophistication.

China's latest air-to-air missiles are now among the best in the world and the country's ability to produce jet engines—an area where it was once decades behind the West—is quickly improving. The Chinese navy, which flaunted its two aircraft-carriers a few weeks ago, will also get in on the action at Zhuhai. It will display a prototype of a new drone ship, a futuristic-looking trimaran called the JARI-USV—or, more evocatively, the “Killer Whale”. China's armed forces have not fought a war in decades. Still, their technological achievements will make Western onlookers sit up and take notice.

Sudan in anguish

The disaster in Sudan tops the agenda at the UN Security Council again on Tuesday. During the 18-month-long civil war about 150,000 people have been killed and 11m displaced. Britain, which holds the Security Council presidency for November, will introduce a resolution to better protect civilians and speed up aid deliveries. Both are needed urgently.

Atrocities in the western region of Darfur continue. The Rapid Support Forces, a paramilitary group, is accused of slaughtering 124 civilians in a village in the state of Gezira on October 25th. The fear of widespread famine grows, particularly as an agreement between the UN and the Sudanese authorities to use the Adre border crossing with Chad to bring in supplies is due to expire in mid-November. And after malnutrition comes disease. Last week the UN reported 28,000 cases of cholera from July to October, with 836 deaths. Instances of dengue fever have also surged. Whatever happens at the UN, the country's anguish will surely continue.

What next for Trump's trials?

Donald Trump has been handed a get-out-of-jail-free card by voters. Before winning America's presidential election on November 5th, he was facing several criminal cases. One, in Manhattan, had already yielded a guilty verdict. A conviction in any of the other three could have meant prison time.

On Tuesday the judge overseeing the hush-money trial in Manhattan stayed proceedings until next week so that the parties can work out what comes next. Mr Trump's lawyers want his conviction tossed. Judge Juan Merchan has to consider whether the Supreme Court's ruling on presidential immunity, released after the trial, invalidated some of the prosecution's evidence. The judge may eventually dismiss the case, or decide that the conviction stands and proceed to sentencing. Mr Trump would be comfortable with either outcome. Even if the verdict holds, a prison sentence—a remote prospect for an elderly first-time offender—is vanishingly unlikely now he has won back the White House. Moreover the other cases against him will disappear or be frozen for four years.

An early win sets the stage for COP29

Host countries of the United Nations climate conference, or COP, like to put on a show of leadership by pushing through a big deal early on. Azerbaijan, whose capital, Baku, is the site of COP29, is no different. The conference began on Monday with a decision on Article 6, a clause of the Paris Agreement meant to create an international carbon market. Negotiations over the issue at COP28 last year collapsed, in part because countries could not agree on what counts as “offsetting” carbon emissions.

Azerbaijan’s solution was unorthodox. On the first day of the conference, rather than continuing to negotiate how to trade carbon credits, countries were presented with a list of standards drawn up by a supervisory body ahead of time. These included prescriptions against using indigenous people’s land without their consent, and a mechanism to use some of the proceeds to fund climate adaptation. Many countries felt they had no choice but to approve them (and did so reluctantly). Whether the progress was worth the discord may not become clearer until later in the conference.

Correction: An earlier version of this piece said that Azerbaijan unilaterally drew up standards and persuaded other countries to agree to them. In fact those standards were agreed by a supervisory body. Sorry.

The top contenders for the Booker prize

On Tuesday the judges of the Booker prize, the most prestigious award for fiction written in English, will reveal this year's winner. Whoever prevails will get £50,000 ($64,000) in prize money as well as a significant boost in sales. In 2023 sales of “Prophet Song”, Paul Lynch’s dystopian vision of an authoritarian Ireland, surged by 1,500% in the week after it won the award.

The six authors on the shortlist come from America, Australia, Britain, Canada and the Netherlands. Bookmakers reckon two titles have the best chance of winning: “Orbital” by Samantha Harvey, which follows astronauts on the International Space Station as they go about their daily routines, and “James” by Percival Everett, a retelling of Mark Twain’s “Adventures of Huckleberry Finn” from the perspective of Jim, a slave. Both authors have been in the running before. Ms Harvey was longlisted for the Booker in 2009; Mr Everett was shortlisted in 2022.
