

Catch up: Trump officials defend tariffs; countries and businesses react

Officials in the Trump administration defended the imposition of swingeing tariffs on imports to America. Scott Bessent, the treasury secretary, said the steep drop in stockmarkets on Thursday and Friday was a “short-term” reaction, and that there was no reason to expect the measures to cause a recession. The head of the National Economic Council, Kevin Hassett, said prices could rise, but this would not be a “heavy burden” on American consumers. One trade adviser urged Americans “not to panic”.

Indonesia, South-East Asia’s largest economy, said it would not retaliate against a trade tariff of 32% imposed on it by Donald Trump. Instead, the finance minister said that the country would pursue negotiations with America and sell more into European markets. The region was hit hard by the new tariffs; Vietnamese businesses have asked America to delay the introduction of a 46% levy on their goods.

A Russian air attack on Kyiv, the capital of Ukraine, killed at least one person and wounded several others. The city’s mayor, Vitali

Klitschko, added that fires were blazing in three districts. This followed a similar Russian assault on Kryvyi Rih, the home city of Ukraine's president, Volodymyr Zelensky, which left at least 19 dead, on Friday.

America revoked all visas issued to South Sudanese passport holders. The move came after the sub-Saharan country, which is on the verge of another civil war, refused to accept its citizens deported from America. Marco Rubio, America's secretary of state, accused South Sudan's transitional government of "taking advantage" of his country.

The Israel Defence Forces admitted that its soldiers had made mistakes in the killing of 15 aid workers in Gaza on March 23rd. The IDF claimed at first that the workers' convoy of vehicles had no lights on when it approached an Israeli checkpoint. But video on the mobile phone of one of the dead showed that the vehicles had lights showing.

The death toll from the earthquake that struck Myanmar on March 28th rose to at least 3,471. Heavy rains and high winds have impeded rescue efforts. Aid agencies warn that these conditions, combined with high temperatures, could cause outbreaks of disease. The United Nations renewed its call for aid to the country; a senior official said that the damage across Mandalay, Myanmar's second-biggest city, was "staggering".

Ronin, a giant African pouched rat, set a new landmine-sniffing record, uncovering more than 100 mines in Cambodia. Landmines from consecutive wars in the country have killed tens of thousands of people there in the past four decades. Rats like Ronin are trained to sniff out chemicals used in the weapons. The Guinness Book of World Records congratulated the rodent for his "crucial work".

Figure of the day: 380,000 tonnes, the approximate amount of tin that was refined last year globally, compared with 26m of copper.

Read the full story.

Donald Trump has begun his second term at a blistering pace. Keep up with his executive orders, legal challenges against them and what Americans think about it all on our presidential tracker.

Investors brace for more pain

It'll be a nervous Monday. Stockmarkets around the world suffered one of the fastest sell-offs on record after President Donald Trump's shocking tariff announcement on Wednesday. The S&P 500 index dropped by more than 10% in two days, the steepest decline since March 2020, when the impact of the covid-19 pandemic was rippling through financial markets. Economists at JPMorgan Chase now expect that the American economy will fall into recession this year.

More market turmoil is likely if no relief arrives before the highest levies are raised on April 9th. And a look at the unenviable job now facing the Federal Reserve will calm few nerves. With growth slowing and the price of imported goods surging, America's central bankers are torn between their two mandates: to limit unemployment and keep inflation around 2%. Any investors hoping that the Fed will rush to the rescue by cutting interest rates aggressively may be disappointed.

EU trade ministers ready their response

Donald Trump's escalation of his trade war could have been worse for Europe. The EU did not have to spell out how devastating and self-defeating the latest levies are; the markets did that for them. China also helped, by immediately hitting back in kind, reducing the pressure on the EU to respond immediately. But on Monday, EU trade ministers will get down to discussing retaliation for America's steel, aluminium and car tariffs. It is a practice run, in a way, and allows the EU to fire some warning shots.

Some suspended retaliation against metal tariffs from Mr Trump's first term has already been reactivated (eg, levies on motorcycles). But on Monday ministers will respond to additional metals tariffs that Mr Trump imposed on supposed national-security grounds. The EU plans to start with tariffs on a lower total value of American goods, and then escalate if required.

Macron's push for peace in the Middle East

Emmanuel Macron begins a two-day visit to Egypt on Monday. The region's conflicts will be at the centre of discussions. On Tuesday the French president will travel to Al-Arish on the Sinai peninsula. It lies 50km from Rafah, an entry point to Gaza. The humanitarian disaster there has intensified since Israel ended a truce and launched fresh air strikes against Hamas.

Mr Macron has called the strikes “a dramatic step backwards”. Israel says it broke the truce because Hamas refuses to hand over more Israeli hostages; the militant group has rejected an American proposal to do so as part of a prolonged ceasefire. Egypt is one of the countries mediating between the two sides. Mr Macron wants to encourage discussions about the region's future. In June France and Saudi Arabia will co-host a conference on “the implementation of a two-state solution”—an idea that is anathema to Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister.

Fighting back at Trump in the courts

The battle over Donald Trump's bombshell political agenda is not being waged on Capitol Hill, where the Republicans command majorities in both the Senate and the House, but rather in the courts. A conservative organisation is challenging Mr Trump's tariff blitz. And the country's 23 Democratic state attorneys-general are challenging the constitutionality of many executive orders, from shutting the Department of Education to slashing public-health funding. California and New York, the biggest and richest Democratic states, are leading the opposition. On Monday top lawyers gather in Nashville to talk shop at the National Association of Attorneys General Symposium.

Attorneys-general have increasingly shaped national policy by filing lawsuits against federal actions in friendly courts. Judges then have the extraordinary power to issue nationwide injunctions, nixing presidential orders. On this front, Democrats are seeing glimmers of hope. In the dozen-plus cases states have brought against the administration so far, Democrats have won temporary relief in at least eight.

The Baller League is taking off

In 2023 in Germany an entrepreneur, Felix Starck, partnered with two former international footballers, Lukas Podolski and Mats Hummels, to launch a six-a-side indoor competition called the Baller League. It was pitched halfway between the hallowed Bundesliga and an after-work kick-about. Broadcast on free-to-air TV and online, it amassed lots of attention and some sponsors. The competition has now started in Britain, with America to follow.

In the British league, the third round of matches take place on Monday. Several current and former pros, including Gary Lineker and Chloe Kelly, together with an array of wildly popular YouTubers, are in charge of the teams. They bring in very different audiences, which helps to explain Baller's popularity. Some of the players are academy graduates, others ex-pros. The Premier League need not worry, yet. But in an era of sky-high ticket prices, merchandise and TV subscriptions, the appeal of the Baller League is a warning that less-serious alternatives do exist.

Daily quiz

The Economist

We will serve you a new question each day this week. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and, as important, tell us the connecting theme. Email your responses (and include mention of your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to QuizEspresso@economist.com. We'll pick randomly from those with the right answers and crown three winners on Saturday.

Monday: Who won an Oscar for appearing in “The Hours” and Emmys for her roles as producer and actress in “Big Little Lies”?

You can cut the branches of the tree of liberty, but you can't destroy the roots because they are too strong and too many.

Toussaint Louverture