Israeli strikes on Tuesday killed at least 57 Palestinians in Gaza. According to Gaza's health ministry, an air strike hit families sheltering in the al-Mawasi "humanitarian zone", to which Israel has previously told civilians to evacuate. The Israel Defence Forces said the attack targeted jihadist groups, but that it was "looking into" reports that "civilians were injured". Earlier, Antony Blinken, America's secretary of state, told two top Israeli officials that civilian casualties in Gaza were "unacceptably high".

Bob Menendez, a Democratic senator from New Jersey, was convicted by a New York jury on 16 felony charges, including bribery and extortion. Prosecutors accused him of using his influence to help the governments of Egypt and Qatar in exchange for gold bars, a Mercedes and cash. Chuck Schumer, the top-ranking Democrat in the Senate, promptly called on Mr Menendez to resign.

Gabriel Attal resigned as France's prime minister, after last week's snap election delivered a hung parliament. Mr Attal will lead a caretaker government through the Olympics, which begin in Paris on July 26th, and until a new cabinet is appointed by President Emmanuel Macron. With no bloc close to holding a majority and coalition negotiations stalling, France is still desperately searching for a government.

As the investigation into the attempted assassination of Donald Trump continues, officials from America's Department of Homeland Security, the FBI and the Secret Service were invited to testify before a House committee next week. Meanwhile, the Republican National Convention entered its second day in Milwaukee; on Monday Mr Trump selected J.D. Vance as his running-mate.

America's retail sales, excluding cars, rose by 0.4% from the previous month in June, the largest increase in three months. The data suggest that the economy remains reasonably strong even as inflation recedes. However, sales growth has slowed since last year, as high inflation has eroded disposable incomes and consumers are seeking cheaper alternatives to save money.

Ocado, a supplier of warehouse and delivery logistics for supermarkets, including Kroger and Marks & Spencer, raised the profit forecast for its technology business. Its shares rose by around a fifth. The news will calm investors' fears, as the company has recently suffered a series of blows. Ocado was booted off the FTSE 100 in May because its market capitalisation no longer met the index's criteria.

Gareth Southgate resigned as England's manager after Spain beat England 2-1 to win the European championship on Sunday. Mr Southgate was the first manager since 1966 to lead the men's football team into a major tournament final. During his eight years in the post, England reached the final of the Euros in 2021 and 2024, as well as a World Cup semi-final in 2018.

Figure of the day: 10%, the share of Americans who said in a recent survey that the use of force would be justified to prevent Donald Trump from becoming president again. Read the full story.

The attack on Trump unleashes a wave of misinformation

After the assassination attempt against Donald Trump on Saturday, conspiracy theorists on the left and right of the internet quickly agreed about one thing: the shooting must have been orchestrated. The left thinks it was just a performance, the right sees an inside job.

Conspiracy theories about a shocking institutional failure often take hold when an alternative explanation—incompetence—is unsatisfying. Mr Trump's attacker, a 20-year-old Pennsylvania man named Thomas Matthew Crooks, apparently managed to mount a nearby roof with an AR-15-style rifle in hand without being stopped by the police. Little is known about him, but new information is unlikely to change the minds of those who already believe that one group or the other is responsible.

Surviving an assassination attempt may have enhanced Mr Trump's standing in November's election. On Monday he made a defiant entrance to the Republican National Convention in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. This week he will be formally nominated for the presidency for the third time.

Germany's slow economic recovery

The embattled German economy is showing signs of recovery. The Ifo index of economic activity has improved since the beginning of the year. The labour market remains stable. But on Tuesday the ZEW index, a widely watched financial-market survey, fell slightly, after edging up over the past few months.

Germany's economy has been in trouble on various fronts. Geopolitical turmoil has damaged its export businesses; surveys say that global demand is weakening again. The country's transition to green energy is bumpy, and cutting off Russia's gas supplies will mean higher prices for businesses until renewable energy is plentiful. Demographic trends are stacked against it, too: the country's largest cohort, born in 1964, is turning 60 and approaching retirement, while the young cohorts joining the labour market are a lot smaller. After the boom times in the 2010s, a slow recovery is probably the best that markets can hope for.

Wall Street gain, Main Street pain

Morgan Stanley and Bank of America report second-quarter earnings on Tuesday, the last of America's six big lenders to do so. They echoed what other banks have already said: Wall Street is booming and Main Street is just about coping.

On Friday JPMorgan Chase reported record profits, boosted by investment-banking revenues up by nearly 50% year on year and strong trading results. Goldman Sachs also posted double-digit gains. Retail banks, however, fared less well, as charge-offs for bad loans leapt. At Wells Fargo net interest income—the difference between what a bank collects on loans and what it pays on deposits—dropped by 9% year on year.

This marks a sharp reversal in banks' fortunes. When interest rates spiked in 2022, capital-markets businesses quickly suffered. But for consumer borrowers stress takes longer to show. Now they are struggling. As rates have probably peaked, Wall Street is roaring—but the effects will take longer to trickle through to Main Street.

Security summit in the Rockies

America's security and foreign-policy elite, gathering at a mountain retreat in Aspen, Colorado on Tuesday, thought they would spend the best part of four days talking about the uncertain state of the world. Instead, the keenest questions will be about the state of America after a gunman came close to assassinating Donald Trump on Saturday.

Among the scheduled speakers was Alejandro Mayorkas, homeland security secretary, who cancelled his appearance to deal with the crisis. He oversees the Secret Service—responsible for protecting presidents, ex-presidents and other dignitaries—which is now grappling with the most serious failure in decades at a time of high election-season tensions.

Other global matters—from the wars in Ukraine and Gaza to the potential ones over Taiwan and even in space—will loom. Much depends on who occupies the White House next year. That may well be Mr Trump.

Pacific leaders gather in Japan

The leaders of 14 Pacific island states, as well as ministers from Australia and New Zealand, are due to meet Kishida Fumio, Japan's prime minister, in Tokyo on Tuesday for a triennial pow-wow. In recent years, the strategic picture has shifted. Japan worries about China's growing influence in the Pacific, whose shipping lanes it relies on for trade. It aims to deepen engagement with island states to maintain a "free and open Indo-Pacific".

The amount Japan committed in aid to Pacific island states more than tripled to $587m between 2019 and 2021, making the country their fourth-biggest donor; China is third biggest. It is also stepping up military assistance. Mr Kishida is reportedly expected to announce plans to increase the frequency of visits by Japanese naval vessels to island ports. The leaders will also discuss Japan's release of wastewater from the Fukushima nuclear plant last year. The decision outraged many Pacific islanders. Mr Kishida will have to regain their trust.
