

Catch up: Netanyahu defends war in Gaza; tech stock sell-off

In a nearly hour-long speech to America's Congress, Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, forcefully defended his country's war in Gaza. He blamed Hamas for denying Palestinians food aid (in fact Israel is also responsible), rejected allegations that Israel had targeted civilians and sketched out a post-war vision that did not include a Palestinian state. He also thanked Presidents Joe Biden and Donald Trump for their support of Israel and told lawmakers that "our enemies are your enemies" and "our victory will be your victory". Republicans in the chamber reacted enthusiastically. Scores of Democrats boycotted the speech.

The Nasdaq, a tech-heavy American stock-market index, was on track to record its worst daily decline since 2022 as investors sold off tech stocks after disappointing second-quarter earnings. On Tuesday Tesla reported net income of $1.5bn—a 45% drop, year on year—missing analysts' expectations. The electric-vehicle firm's shares fell by over 10% on Wednesday. Alphabet's advertising revenue from YouTube also underperformed estimates.

Profits at Santander, a Spanish bank, rose by 20% year on year during the second quarter. The quarter's earnings were the bank's highest ever. The bank's retail division benefitted from high interest rates in the euro zone, while a new technology platform helped lower costs across all units. Meanwhile BNP Paribas, a French bank, also performed well, as revenue from equity trading soared.

Britain and Germany signed a defence pact, pledging to strengthen their defence industries, improve cybersecurity and boost the effectiveness of joint operations. Keir Starmer, Britain's newly-appointed prime minister, wants to reset relations between Britain and Europe. Meanwhile, with Donald Trump musing about withdrawing support, European countries are ramping up defence spending.

A public inquiry found that 200,000 people in the care of state and religious institutions in New Zealand were abused between 1950 and 2019. The report found that sexual and physical abuse were “commonplace”, affecting nearly one in three people in care. Those from the indigenous Maori community and with mental health problems were most likely to be abused. Christopher Luxon, the prime minister, apologised and promised reforms.

Taiwan battened down the hatches ahead of the arrival of Gaemi, its first typhoon of the season. Residents of Taipei, the capital, were told to stay at home, while flights were cancelled, financial markets were shut and the army was put on high alert. Meanwhile flooding was reported in Manila, the Philippines’ capital, as Gaemi intensified the monsoon.

Profits from the British monarchy’s land and other property assets more than doubled last year to reach a record £1.1bn ($1.4bn), largely thanks to its investments in offshore wind farms. The Crown Estate, which is worth £16bn, owns seabed surrounding England, Wales and Northern Ireland as well as large tracts of land. Britain’s offshore-wind sector generated 17% of its electricity in 2023.

SK Hynix's AI windfall

Last year SK Hynix, the world's second-largest memory-chip maker, was in a slump. A semiconductor glut and sluggish Chinese demand were hurting sales. But in the fourth quarter the South Korean firm made its first quarterly operating profit in over a year, driven by sales of high-bandwidth memory chips. Demand for that technology, which SK Hynix co-developed in 2013 and now dominates, surged as the AI boom took off. Nvidia, America's chip champion, is among SK Hynix's customers. Expect strong results when the firm reports its second-quarter earnings on Thursday. SK Hynix has already sold all the HBM chips it is due to make in 2025.

Chey Tae-won, head of SK Group, has cautioned that the AI boom, like the gold rush, could disappear. Yet the conglomerate is rushing West at full pelt. It plans to spend $77bn on semiconductors and AI over the next five years, 80% of it on AI.

Can the G20 put aside its differences?

Finance ministers and central-bank governors from the G20 will convene in Brazil on Thursday. The host country, which holds the group's rotating presidency this year, has made introducing a global tax on billionaires a priority. Ministers from South Africa, Spain, France and Germany have backed the idea. However, America is reluctant to endorse it. Janet Yellen, its treasury secretary, has said that she would not support negotiations involving redistributing proceeds among countries.

The G20 is lacking in unity in other ways. Geopolitics divides its members. Some poor and middle-income countries, including India, worry about how Western sanctions on Russia might affect their food and energy security and public finances. The informal group has no charter or secretariat, and relies on consensus to make decisions. That complicates matters. Ministers have said they will put geopolitical issues to one side. Whether they can is a different matter.

Vietnam mourns a grey apparatchik

The state funeral for Vietnam's long-serving leader, Nguyen Phu Trong, begins on Thursday. Mr Trong, who was known to be frail, died on July 19th, aged 80. He held Vietnam's most powerful post, as general secretary of the secretive Communist Party of Vietnam, since 2011.

A creature of the party, Mr Trong nevertheless broke the mould. He helped turn Vietnam into a manufacturing alternative to China. He also centralised power within a traditionally collective party leadership. He worried about rampant corruption undermining party discipline and, through his "blazing furnace" campaign, felled many provincial leaders and even three of the party's top brass. But what happens next is uncertain. The state president, To Lam, has been made interim party chief, possibly until the next party congress, slated for 2026. Yet if the ruling Politburo decides to elect a new party chief now, political uncertainty and infighting will ensue. His succession is one thing Mr Trong conspicuously failed to facilitate.

No relief for Colombia's disaster-risk agency

Dave Simonds

Plush hotel suites, clandestine meetings in the presidential palace and inflated contracts allegedly worth 380bn pesos ($95m): the corruption scandal that has engulfed Colombia's Disaster Risk Management Unit for six months grows more preposterous by the day. On Thursday the attorney-general will charge the two main suspects, Olmedo López, the agency's former boss, and Sneyder Pinilla, his deputy.

Both have worked with the authorities to try to secure reduced sentences. The prosecutor has opened 154 cases as a result of their testimonies, which implicate 20 congressmen, senators and government figures, including Ricardo Bonilla, the finance minister. He denies any involvement. According to the disgraced pair, politicians robbed funds intended for destitute regions to buy votes for the president's reforms. The timing is terrible. The imbroglio has drained the agency's funds and stymied its ability to tackle real disasters. A month before La Niña is expected to unleash heavy rain and flooding across Colombia, it has just 10% of its annual budget left.

Marvel searches for a hero

All is not well in the Marvel Cinematic Universe. Once a dominant presence in the entertainment industry, the Disney-owned franchise is in a rut. Analysts blame a surfeit of superhero films, which has dulled audiences' appetites. The MCU's rival, the DC Extended Universe, is also struggling.

But the “Deadpool” series has an advantage that other superhero films lack: it presents a caustic, self-referential parody of the genre and its tropes. By importing “Deadpool” from 20th Century, a Disney-owned studio, the MCU is trying to have it both ways. Had enough of superheroes? Deadpool is a character who shares your disdain. Even so, “Deadpool & Wolverine”, which is released in Britain on Thursday, looks like an exercise in hedging: it pairs its protagonist with the most popular figure in another MCU acquisition, the “X-Men” series. Every comedy needs a straight man, and the MCU has turned to a proven banker to play the role.
