

Catch up: Rockets land near Tel Aviv; far-right's shock lead in Romania

Hizbullah fired more than 250 projectiles towards Israel on Sunday, some of which landed near Tel Aviv, wounding at least seven people. On Saturday an Israeli airstrike hit a residential block in central Beirut, killing at least 29 people and wounding more than 60, according to Lebanese officials. Bombardments have intensified recently despite signs of progress in American-led ceasefire discussions.

Calin Georgescu, a far-right, pro-Russia nationalist, took an unexpected, narrow lead over Marcel Ciolacu, the left-leaning prime minister, in the first round of Romania's presidential election. With 96% of votes counted, Mr Georgescu had 22% compared with Mr Ciolacu's 20%, suggesting they will compete in a second round on December 8th. The result could threaten Romania's pro-Ukraine stance.

Poorer countries criticised an agreement made at COP29, the UN's climate conference. Rich countries committed to mobilising at least $300bn in climate finance per year by 2035 to help developing nations fight climate change. India's delegation called it a "paltry sum". The talks overran by more than a day; an earlier offer of $250bn was rejected.

The Adani Group said it had "enough cash flows" to service its debt. Last week American authorities announced a corruption probe, prompting a sell-off in the Indian conglomerate's stocks and bonds. Dollar bond prices slid to near one-year lows on Monday. Gautam Adani, the chairman, and seven others were charged with agreeing to pay over $250m in bribes. They deny the charges.

Zvi Kogan, a missing Israeli-Moldovan rabbi, was found murdered in the United Arab Emirates, according to Israeli authorities. They called it an "abhorrent act of antisemitic terrorism". The UAE said three suspects had been arrested. The Gulf state was the first of three Arab countries to formalise ties with Israel in the Abraham accords, signed in 2020.

The Eurovision Song Contest will go ahead in Basel, after voters rejected a referendum that would have blocked it. A Christian party had garnered enough signatures in the Swiss city to trigger a vote, arguing that the festival was "blasphemy" and that public money should not be spent on "woke propaganda". But some 66% voted to host the continent's feast day of camp musical fun, according to early figures.

Figure of the day: 124, the number of countries that are members of the International Criminal Court and must therefore extradite

Binyamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, to the court if he steps on their soil. Read the full story.

The long road from Baku to Belém

Talks at COP29, held in Azerbaijan, produced only gridlock for two weeks. The final hours of the United Nations’ annual climate conference, though, were packed with drama. At one point delegates from developing countries and small island states walked out. But a new target was eventually struck. Rich countries committed themselves to giving $300bn a year in climate financing a year for poor ones by 2035. India’s negotiator decried the sum as “paltry”.

The contentious deal overshadowed other discussions. After years of wrangling, rough rules for an international carbon market were approved. But representatives quibbled over a landmark commitment, made at last year’s COP, to “transition away” from fossil fuels—the first time a reference to the main cause of global warming had made it into a UN text. Fierce opposition, particularly from large producers like Saudi Arabia, meant that that promise was not reaffirmed. And an assessment of progress in cutting greenhouse gases was postponed until next year’s conference in Brazil.

India's news parliamentary session

India's parliament begins what is set to be a stormy winter session on Monday. On Wednesday American prosecutors indicted Gautam Adani, an Indian tycoon, and seven others over an alleged scheme to pay over $250m in bribes to Indian officials. Mr Adani, who denies any wrongdoing, is a close ally of Narendra Modi, India's prime minister. Though Mr Modi is not implicated directly, India's opposition is demanding a parliamentary investigation and Mr Adani's arrest.

By all rights, Mr Modi should have been celebrating. India's opposition alliance won a state election that ended on Saturday in Jharkhand, in eastern India. But his Bharatiya Janata Party and its allies took a larger prize, winning in Maharashtra, India's richest state. The scandal threatens to overshadow the result, and disrupt the government's plans to pass 16 bills this parliament session, including a controversial one regulating Muslim charitable endowments. It will not welcome the distraction.

Sputter, sputter, Zoom?

Zoom was a star performer among tech stocks during the pandemic. The video-conferencing firm's share price soared by 273% between March and October 2020. But as covid-19 receded and enthusiasm for remote work waned, its valuation fell from $161bn at its peak to $25bn. Quarterly results, announced on Monday, will be a health report on the firm.

Eric Yuan, Zoom's founder and boss, believes that it is more than "just meeting conferencing". The firm is betting on a new "AI companion". It helps users draft emails and chat messages, summarise meetings and look up answers on the internet. In August Zoom raised its revenue forecast for 2024, citing strong demand for its AI-powered tools. The company's share price has risen by 17% since January. But it lags behind the NASDAQ Composite, a tech-heavy index, which is up by 28%. Investors will be looking for signs that Zoom's AI-based strategy is working.

Will Egypt's state withdraw from its economy?

On Monday Egypt's government will complete a private sale of up to $104m-worth of shares in United Bank, which is majority owned by the state. Starting on Wednesday, the public can buy in. It will be Egypt's first initial public offering since 2021. The government has floated the idea of at least a dozen more IPOs of state-owned firms.

Nearby conflicts are battering Egypt's economy and reducing government revenue. The government hopes to receive a $1.3bn tranche from an $8bn International Monetary Fund loan programme. It has promised reforms in exchange. The country's main underlying problem is that the state, and specifically the army, has a stranglehold on the economy.

Mr Sisi has conspicuously failed to keep previous promises to reduce the state's economic footprint. The IPOs may suggest that is changing. On November 20th the IMF said Egypt is making "substantial progress". The strongman may finally be keeping his word.

Even chess champs get the yips

Ding Liren once played 100 chess matches without losing. In 2018 he was the joint-tenth highest-rated player in history. And in 2023 he became China's first world chess champion. Yet when he defends his title against Gukesh Dommaraju, an 18-year-old Indian, over the next three weeks, Mr Ding will be the underdog.

After becoming champion Mr Ding's form collapsed, leading him to take a months-long break during which he sought psychological help. The champion admits that he is afraid of losing badly to Gukesh (as he prefers to be called). Magnus Carlsen, the greatest living player, has speculated that Mr Ding is "permanently broken".

This focus on Mr Ding risks underplaying his challenger's achievements. Gukesh is the youngest person ever to win the right to face a world champion. If he wins, the youngster will get the attention he deserves. A victory for Mr Ding, though, would be a stirring comeback.
