

Catch up: turmoil on stockmarkets; opposition leader freed in Bangladesh

Uncertainty continued to shroud global stockmarkets as European indices dipped, having rebounded in pre-market trading. Germany's DAX, France's CAC and Britain's FTSE100 lost all their previous gains. Earlier, Topix, Japan's benchmark index, closed 9.3% up, partly recovering from a 12% plunge the previous day. On Monday the Dow Jones Industrial Average and S&P 500 indices suffered their sharpest declines in almost two years.

Khaleda Zia, an opposition leader and former prime minister of Bangladesh, was released from house arrest. She was an arch rival of Sheikh Hasina, the former prime minister who resigned and fled the country on Monday. Meanwhile, student protesters called for Muhammad Yunus, a Nobel peace prize winner, to be the chief adviser to an interim government.

A federal judge in America awarded the Justice Department a victory over Google, ruling that the tech giant violated antitrust laws to dominate online search. The judge agreed that Google's actions—paying billions to Apple and other companies to be the default search engine on their platforms—created a barrier to entry for competitors. The case is one of several big antitrust suits America’s government has launched.

A spokesperson for Iran’s foreign minister said that his country has the “right” to punish Israel following the assassination of Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas’s political leader, on its territory. Meanwhile Reuters reported that at least five Americans were injured in an attack against an American military base in western Iraq. It is unclear whether the strike was related to the killing in Iran.

A court in Tunisia sentenced four presidential candidates to prison ahead of a vote in October. All of them were banned from running for office over charges of vote-buying. Opposition figures have accused Tunisian officials of imposing unfair restrictions to ensure the re-election of Kais Saied, the president. Mr Saied filed his candidacy papers on Monday and vowed to “establish a new republic”.

Brazil will represent Argentina and Peru in Venezuela, after the government of Nicolás Maduro broke off relations with its two Latin American neighbours. Argentina and Peru both (correctly) recognised Edmundo González as the winner of the election that Mr Maduro stole on July 28th. Brazil has called for Mr Maduro to provide evidence of his victory, which he has failed to do.

Armand Duplantis broke the world pole-vault record for the ninth time, and with it secured consecutive Olympic gold medals. He cleared 6.25m, a whopping 30cm higher than his closest rival. The Swede now has a claim to be the greatest vaulter of all time. After securing first place Mr Duplantis embarked on a lap of honour to the strains of Sweden’s unofficial national anthem, Abba’s “Dancing Queen”.

Figure of the day: three percentage points, Kamala Harris’s poll lead over Donald Trump, according to our tracker.

Harris's big reveal

Kamala Harris has had weeks, rather than months, as is normally the case, to pick a running-mate. She is reportedly set to announce her choice on Tuesday, hours before she holds a rally with him in Philadelphia. The pair will then embark on a swing-state tour, visiting Wisconsin, Michigan, North Carolina, Georgia, Arizona and Nevada before the week's end.

Ms Harris is thought to have held final interviews with three candidates: Mark Kelly, a senator from Arizona; Josh Shapiro, Pennsylvania's governor; and Tim Walz, Minnesota's governor. All are white men. Messrs Kelly and Shapiro are swing-state centrists. Mr Walz leans further left, and his state is safer for the Democrats. But his rural Midwestern background could appeal to moderates across the region.

A running-mate's effect on an election's outcome is usually small. Still, a poor choice can cost votes. Ms Harris will hope that her pick keeps her early momentum going.

America and Australia's growing alliance

Antony Blinken, America's secretary of state, and Lloyd Austin, the defence secretary, host annual security talks with their Australian counterparts in Annapolis, Maryland on Tuesday, after similar recent meetings with Japan and the Philippines. The Biden administration is beefing up its network of alliances in Asia to counter China's military build-up. Australia, which is beyond the range of most Chinese weapons, is a critical part of that "lattice-work". The partners are upgrading Australian military bases, conducting more joint training exercises and boosting weapons production. Under AUKUS, a trilateral defence pact that also includes Britain, America plans to arm Australia with nuclear-powered submarines.

Both sides will be keen to showcase progress on such initiatives. For now, the "unbreakable alliance", as Mr Austin calls it, has bipartisan support in both countries. Yet some Australian critics worry about America's reliability and complain that the alliance makes them more likely, not less, to be drawn into an Asian war.

Reddit goes for growth

On Tuesday Reddit publishes quarterly earnings. The social-media platform went public in March; its first earnings report in May revealed solid revenue growth and record-high user numbers, causing its share price to jump. Reddit's users—about 80m each day—connect over shared interests on forums, or “subreddits”, covering topics from strange animal pictures to baking guides. Its main business is selling advertisements. It made about $800m in ad revenue last year.

In a bid to boost sales Reddit recently bought Memorable AI, a startup that uses artificial intelligence to help marketers make better ads. But a bigger factor in generating revenue is increasing web traffic, at which Reddit has recently excelled. In May Steve Huffman, the firm's boss, said it had invested in speeding up its site, which gives it a better ranking on Google searches. That, however, could leave the social-media platform exposed. The latest earnings may reveal to what extent Reddit has become dependent on Google's algorithm.

A chronic headache for Bayer

Bayer, a German pharmaceutical and chemical conglomerate, is in a tough spot. On Tuesday it revealed mixed half-year results. Revenues rose slightly, but profits fell mainly because of currency fluctuations. The company is also saddled with lawsuits alleging that Roundup, a popular weedkiller from its subsidiary Monsanto, causes cancer. The firm denies wrongdoing, but has so far paid $9.5bn in settlements to more than 100,000 plaintiffs and set aside $6bn for future claims. Patents for two of Bayer's blockbuster drugs expire in coming years but its pipeline of future medications is weak.

In February Bill Anderson, Bayer's boss, unveiled a plan to improve its fortunes. This included cutting dividends by 95% and paring its workforce. The group also delayed plans to break itself up as it tries to strengthen its drug-development pipeline and reduce its debt. In the past year the company's market capitalisation has fallen by half. Tuesday's results did little to change that.

A fierce Olympic rivalry

Athletes at the Paris Olympics have generally shown the camaraderie that is supposed to be characteristic of the games. On Sunday Noah Lyles of America and Kishane Thompson of Jamaica sprinted to a photo-finish in the men's 100m final. As they awaited the result Mr Lyles, who eventually claimed gold, affectionately referred to Mr Thompson as “big dog”.

There will be less of that spirit in the men's 1,500m final on Tuesday, when Britain's Josh Kerr will run against his arch-rival, Jakob Ingebrigtsen of Norway. Mr Kerr has accused Mr Ingebrigtsen of lacking manners; the Norwegian claims he could beat the Brit blindfolded. Mr Ingebrigtsen is the favourite: he has posted eight times that are faster than Mr Kerr's personal best of three minutes and 29 seconds. Still, the British athlete could cause an upset. He beat his Scandinavian rival to win gold at the world championships last year.
