

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: AFP

Ursula von der Leyen, the president of the European Commission, said that the European Union would not impose retaliatory tariffs on American goods before August 1st. On Saturday Donald Trump threatened a 30% levy on many EU goods entering America, starting from the same date. Ms von der Leyen said that the bloc would prefer a “negotiated solution” but was preparing “countermeasures” to be used if negotiations fail.

Iran will resume nuclear talks if America guarantees that it will not attack again, said Abbas Araghchi, the foreign minister. America bombed three Iranian nuclear facilities in June. It is unclear how much damage the strikes did to the country’s nuclear programme. Mr Araghchi also reiterated that Iran would continue to enrich uranium. America insists it should not.

Muhammadu Buhari, a former ruler of Nigeria, has died, aged 82. Mr Buhari came to power in a military coup in 1983, ruling for two years before he was overthrown. After becoming a democrat, he was elected president in 2015. During his eight-year tenure he mismanaged the economy and failed to provide political leadership. Nigerians grew poorer and violence increased.

Kim Jong Un, North Korea's dictator, said that Russia has his “unconditional support” in its war on Ukraine during a visit by Sergei Lavrov, Russia's foreign minister. North Korea is estimated to have sent 11,000 soldiers to help Russia. Ukrainian intelligence expects the Asian country to send at least 25,000 more. Russia's top diplomat hailed an “invincible fighting brotherhood”.

An Israel missile hit a refugee camp in Gaza, killing at least eight people, many of them children. The Israeli Defence Forces said that the projectile had malfunctioned and missed its target. The IDF expressed regret and said it was investigating the incident. Gaza's health ministry said on Sunday that 139 people had been killed in the territory in the past 24 hours.

France announced a “historic” deal with New Caledonia, a French overseas territory where anti-colonial unrest took place last year. The nickel-rich Pacific islands will remain French but will be a new state “within the Republic”, said Emmanuel Macron, France's president. New Caledonians will have to approve the arrangement in a referendum, and it will have to pass France's parliament.

Jannik Sinner of Italy beat Carlos Alcaraz, a Spaniard, in four sets to win his first Wimbledon men's singles title. Mr Sinner had lost his last five matches against Mr Alcaraz, who has won Wimbledon twice. Their most recent duel was a five-hour thriller at the French Open in June in which Mr Alcaraz took the title. On Saturday Iga Swiatek thrashed Amanda Anisimova 6-0, 6-0 to win the Wimbledon women's singles championship.

Figure of the day: Over 100,000, the number of people who marched in Budapest's Pride parade, and defying a government ban. Read the full story.

Photograph: Getty Images

Singapore's trade-war worries

Few countries have as much reason to worry about Donald Trump's disruption of global trade as Singapore. The city-state's trade-to-GDP ratio is more than 300%, among the highest in the world. Singapore's exports to America are subject to a 10% baseline tariff, which is lower than those on its neighbours' goods. But threatened levies on semiconductors and pharmaceuticals could hit it hard.

Analysts expect GDP estimates for the second quarter, due on Monday, to show that Singapore's economy is holding up. Some believe that year-on-year growth was around 4.4%, up from 3.9% in the first quarter. But Gan Kim Yong, the city-state's trade minister, has warned that a "front-loading effect", from a surge of exports to America to avoid impending tariffs, will diminish. Growth, he says, will probably slow. Mr Gan plans to visit America this month for trade negotiations. But, as those who have tried before can attest, striking a good deal is easier said than done.

Photograph: EPA

The EU prepares for tough trade negotiations

America's latest tariff rampage has reached the European Union. On June 12th Donald Trump announced that EU goods entering America would face a 30% tariff, starting from August 1st. That is much higher than the 20% rate imposed in April, which was reduced to 10%. On Monday the EU's trade ministers will meet to discuss their response, as well as tactics for an EU delegation visiting Beijing on July 24th.

The EU has had little success bargaining with either superpower recently. That is hardly surprising. The bloc has some leverage, but both of its negotiating partners have more. America can threaten to stop supporting Ukraine and pull away from Europe. China could increase its support for Russia. After all, the Ukraine conflict helps it by stretching the West's resources and keeping it busy. The EU's trade ministers know that upcoming trade talks are about a lot more than trade. The question is whether they can devise an approach to match.

Photograph: Getty Images

Afghans lose their right to live in America

In May America's Department of Homeland Security said that Afghans will no longer be eligible for Temporary Protected Status, which is for people who have fled from wars or natural disasters and may not qualify for asylum. On Monday they lose their right to live in America. Many who left Afghanistan after America's withdrawal in 2021 may now have to return to live under Taliban rule. Some of them helped during America's occupation.

While in power Democrats relied on temporary protections to help migrants from dangerous places. Reforming immigration law would have been harder. In 2024 1.1m people had TPS. Donald Trump has now cancelled that status for Afghans, Haitians, Hondurans, Nicaraguans, Venezuelans and others. Some have lived in America for decades. By making these legal migrants illegal, Mr Trump has made them vulnerable to his mass-deportation programme. And he has revealed the flaw in Democrats' tactic: as the name suggests, TPS is just temporary.

Photograph: IMAGO

Another twist in Sudan's civil war?

Fighting is intensifying in North Kordofan, the state immediately to the west of Khartoum, Sudan's capital. The Sudanese army and the Rapid Support Forces, a paramilitary group, are warring over el-Obeid, the state capital. In February, after nearly two years, the army broke an RSF siege of the city, which has a military garrison and straddles an important motorway. Now the rebels are trying to take el-Obeid again.

Victory would be yet another swing in Sudan's see-sawing civil war. The RSF, which has been accused of genocide, is again on the offensive. Since losing control of Khartoum in March it has secured a vital supply route from Libya and made advances in the south. However the fighting goes, Sudan's civilians will continue to suffer. The battle for el-Obeid has already forced thousands from their homes. Food is scarce and cholera is spreading.

Photograph: Netflix

Apocalypse in the tropics

Jair Bolsonaro, Brazil's former president, and Donald Trump, America's president, have much in common. Both are brash, unapologetic demagogues who fulminate against opponents in fire-and-brimstone sermons. And both stir up such fervour that, when they lost elections, their followers stormed the seats of their countries' governments. The two hard-right populists share another trait—they are popular among evangelical Christians.

According to “Apocalypse in the Tropics”, a documentary directed by Petra Costa that premieres on Netflix on Monday, the similarity between American evangelicals' embrace of MAGA and evangelical support for bolsonarismo is no coincidence. Ms Costa, an Oscar nominee, ascribes the rise in the proportion of Brazilians professing to be evangelical Christians—from 5% in 1970 to 27% now—to American missionaries. The Nixon administration sent evangelical preachers to Brazil in the 1970s to combat “liberation theology”, a Marxian creed popular among progressive Catholic priests. Messrs Trump and Bolsonaro, vocal anti-Marxists, would doubtless have shared enthusiasm for that mission.

Illustration: The Economist

Daily Quiz

We will serve you a new question each day this week. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and, as important, tell us the connecting theme. Email your responses (and include mention of your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick randomly from those with the right answers and crown three winners on Saturday.

Monday: Which cyclist, considered one of the greatest of all time, won an unequalled 11 grand tour events, including five Tour de France?

It's not only the question, but the way you try to solve it.

Maryam Mirzakhani