

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: Getty Images/Bloomberg Creative

Global markets rallied after the Senate voted to advance a bill to end America's longest-ever federal shutdown. Late on Sunday Democratic senators backed legislation to re-open the government. The bill must still pass both houses and receive Donald Trump's sign-off. Indices across Asia rose, with Japan's Nikkei 225 closing 1.3% higher in response to the breakthrough. The Stoxx Europe 600 climbed 1.4% in early trading.

The chair of the BBC, Samir Shah, apologised for an “error of judgement” in editing a speech made by Donald Trump. The White House had criticised the British public broadcaster's documentary on the Capitol insurrection that appeared to be selectively edited. Mr Shah also criticised the leaked memo that led to the resignation of Tim Davie, the BBC's director general, on Sunday.

Thailand suspended its American-brokered ceasefire agreement with Cambodia after two Thai soldiers were injured by a landmine near its border with Cambodia. The ceasefire deal, which was signed on October 26th, had set out steps to end a senseless border war between the two countries. Anutin Charnvirakul, Thailand's prime minister, said “everything must be stopped.” This will include a planned prisoner exchange.

China said it would stop charging America fees for docking ships at its ports for a year. America responded by saying it would halt its plan to impose 100% tariffs on imported Chinese shore-to-ship cranes. The announcements make good on a trade truce reached by the two countries last month after an escalating tit-for-tat trade war.

Typhoon Fung-wong killed at least eight people and forced more than 1.4m to flee their homes in the Philippines. Heavy rain caused floods and landslides, and left almost 3m people without power across the country. Several airports remain closed. The super-typhoon was downgraded to a typhoon on Monday morning. It is forecast to hit Taiwan on Wednesday.

South Korea's special prosecutor indicted Yoon Suk Yeol, a former president, on new charges, including abuse of power and aiding an enemy state. The prosecutor alleges that Mr Yoon attempted to provoke a conflict between South and North Korea as part of his short-lived attempt to impose martial law in December 2024. South Korea's constitutional court ruled to oust Mr Yoon in April.

Singapore announced the world's first green-fuel tax from next year. Air passengers leaving the city-state will be charged between S$1.00 ($0.77) and S$41.60, depending on flight distance and cabin class. The tax revenue will be used to buy sustainable fuel, which Singapore hopes will make up 3-5% of all fuel used in its airports by 2030.

Figure of the day: £9bn ($11.5bn), the value of Britain's legal-services exports last year, up from £6.3bn in 2020. Read the full story.

Photograph: EPA

Brazil hosts a “COP of truth” in the Amazon

In 1992, Brazil hosted the Rio “Earth Summit” which produced the UN’s convention on climate change and its system of annual meetings. This year’s conference, COP30, returns to Brazil—but to Belém, a city in the Amazon. The hosts hope that being amid one of the world’s most vital ecosystems will promote cooperation.

Last week the UN admitted, for the first time, that the goal of limiting global warming to 1.5°C above pre-industrial levels is no longer achievable. Brazil’s president promised a “COP of truth” at which countries actually delivered on past promises. These include reducing emissions and transitioning away from fossil fuels more quickly, and the commitment made at COP29 to provide poor countries with at least $300bn for climate mitigation and adaptation by 2035. But such arguments have snarled climate negotiations for three decades. And appetite for climate action in America and Europe has dwindled drastically. Progress will require far more than symbolic scenery.

Off-target targets

Greenhouse-gas emission trajectories, gigatonnes of CO₂ equivalent

*Nationally Determined Contributions
under the Paris Agreement

[†]A 66% chance by 2100

[‡]A 50% chance by 2100 (at least a 33% chance over the course of the next century)

Source: UNEP Emissions Gap Report, 2025

Photograph: Alamy

Syria's rehabilitation abroad

It will be a scene unthinkable just a year ago. On Monday Ahmed al-Sharaa, the Syrian president, will meet Donald Trump in Washington. As recently as December Mr Sharaa had a $10m American bounty on his head for his role as an al-Qaeda commander. Now he is set to become the first Syrian president to visit the White House.

Ahead of the visit, America's Treasury removed the Syrian president and his spy chief from its sanctions list. Congress is also debating a repeal of the Caesar Act, a 2019 law that placed tough sanctions on Syria's construction, energy and finance sectors. The Senate has already voted to rescind it (the House has not).

At home, some Syrians are growing frustrated with Mr Sharaa's insular rule and tight inner circle. Still, many admire his transformation abroad.

Photograph: Getty Images

India's poorest state goes to the polls

India's ambition to become rich depends heavily on Bihar, the eastern state that is home to about a tenth of its population. Per-person income there is only 66,000 rupees ($800) a year, less than a third of the national average. That makes the state's election, which concludes on Tuesday, hugely consequential. The result, due on Friday, will also test the popularity of the Bharatiya Janata Party, which runs India and is part of the ruling coalition in Bihar. And it will reveal how well the opposition can unite.

On the campaign trail politicians made vague promises about bringing growth to the state, but they also played up caste identities, which are particularly entrenched in Bihar. Parties have picked candidates according to their ability to rally particular communities, rather than for their ideas for development or their performance on the stump. It is an old pattern, and one reason the state remains India's poorest.

Photograph: Booker Prize Foundation

Who will win the Booker prize?

After judging the Booker prize in 1985, Joanna Lumley, a British actor, concluded that the “so-called bitchy world of acting” was a “tea party compared with the piranha-infested waters of publishing”. (Ms Lumley had described Keri Hulme’s “The Bone People” as “over-my-dead-body stuff”. The book won anyway.)

This year’s judges—who include Roddy Doyle, a former winner, and Sarah Jessica Parker, another bibliophile actor—no doubt had many lively debates and disagreements about the novels in the running for the coveted annual award for fiction in English. The winner will be revealed at a ceremony on Monday.

Bookmakers have Kiran Desai’s “The Loneliness of Sonia and Sunny”, which tells the story of two young Indians trying to make it in America, as the frontrunner. (Ms Desai previously won the Booker in 2006 for “The Inheritance of Loss”.) Another favourite is Andrew Miller’s “The Land in Winter”, which follows two pregnant neighbours during one of the coldest winters on record in Britain.

Illustration: The Economist

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each day this week. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and, as important, tell us the connecting theme. Email your responses (and include mention of your home city and country) by 1700 GMT on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick randomly from those with the right answers and crown three winners on Saturday.

Monday: What city is home to the La Brea tar pits?

The mark of mediocrity is to look for precedent.

Norman Mailer