

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: AFP via Getty Images

The cop30 talks concluded with an agreement that made no reference to the use of fossil fuels, angering negotiators from countries that wanted a stronger commitment to phase out their use. The final deal was delayed by clashes between the EU, which wanted a firmer resolution, and oil-producing countries. Delegates from several places, including Colombia, objected to the wording after it had been gavelled.

Western leaders issued a joint-statement saying “additional work” is needed on America’s proposed plan to end the war in Ukraine. They insisted that EU and NATO consent were needed on key issues, and criticised the condition that Ukraine must reduce its armed forces. Earlier Donald Trump gave Volodymyr Zelensky, Ukraine’s president, a deadline of Thursday to accept the proposal.

Israeli air strikes killed at least 20 people in Gaza, according to Palestinian health authorities. Israel said the attack was in response to a Hamas fighter entering Israeli-held territory in the enclave, which it called a “blatant violation” of the ceasefire agreement struck six weeks ago. Both sides have accused the other of violating the truce several times.

Jair Bolsonaro, Brazil's right-wing populist former president, was detained by federal police. Mr Bolsonaro had been under house arrest since he was convicted in September of plotting a coup, and was days away from beginning a prison sentence. Brazil's supreme court ordered his arrest after his supporters planned to gather outside his home for a vigil, which the court feared could be used to effect an escape.

Gunmen abducted more than 300 schoolchildren and 12 teachers in an attack on a Catholic school in Nigeria on Friday, according to revised estimates from a local Christian association. The new figure is significantly higher than the 215 initially reported. It is the latest of three mass kidnappings in the country over the past week.

China took its two-week-long spat with Japan to the United Nations. On Friday its representative, Fu Cong, sent a letter to the UN's secretary-general, Antonio Guterres, condemning Japan's "highly dangerous" comments that "expressed its ambition for armed intervention". Takaichi Sanae, Japan's new prime minister, had told the country's Diet that a Chinese attack on Taiwan could necessitate a military response.

The owner of the Daily Mail agreed to buy the Telegraph, a rival British newspaper, for £500m ($654m). The deal, which will draw scrutiny from regulators, would make Daily Mail and General Trust the proprietor of two of Fleet Street's most influential right-wing outlets. The Telegraph Media Group, the paper's publisher, is prized for being a prominent voice in conservative British politics.

Apology and correction: we said the Telegraph Media Group was loss-making at its last results. That was wrong; it was profit-making. Its last loss-making result was for the 2023 financial year.

Word of the week: Benshengzhuan, a pathway through which university graduates in China can go on to secure vocational training. Read the full story.

Photograph: Reuters

Donald Trump's peace plan for Ukraine

America is pushing for Ukraine to agree to a peace deal by Thanksgiving on November 27th. The Trump administration's 28-point plan demands painful concessions from Ukraine. One is that Ukraine cedes the part of Donetsk that Russia has failed to take after trying for nearly four years. Others include ruling out ever joining NATO and limiting the size of its army to 600,000 soldiers.

The plan stops just short of being the demand for total capitulation that many of Ukraine's allies have feared. Under the proposal, Russia would not be recognised as having legal title to the occupied territories. The frontline running through Kherson and Zaporizhzhia, two south-eastern regions Russia claims, would be frozen. It would forfeit some of its frozen financial assets, which would be used to rebuild Ukraine, and return the 20,000 Ukrainian children that it forcibly deported. But the plan would give Russia much of what it wants and, critically, the "security guarantees" that Ukraine would get are vague and feeble.

Photograph: Getty Images

The blame game over October 7th

On Saturday Israel's opposition parties and anti-government groups, including supporters of former hostages and bereaved families, held a rally calling for an inquiry into the security failures that allowed Hamas to carry out the attacks of October 7th 2023. For two years the prime minister, Binyamin Netanyahu, delayed such an inquiry. He promised to open one after the end of the war in Gaza.

On November 16th Mr Netanyahu's cabinet formed a ministerial committee to set up the commission to run the inquiry. It will not satisfy the opposition. Under Israeli law, members of such commissions must be appointed by the Supreme Court. But the government has argued that the court cannot be trusted to appoint an impartial panel and wants the commission's members to be appointed by politicians. They hope to shield Mr Netanyahu from accusations that his policies let Hamas grow strong in Gaza. The war may be over, but the recriminations over how it began continue.

Photograph: Sotheby's

Grudges, gambling and glamour in Hong Kong

Sotheby's "Masterpieces of Asian Art" auction was lively when it began in Hong Kong on Saturday. The auction house is selling treasures from Japan's Okada Museum of Art, founded by Okada Kazuo, a billionaire known as the "Pachinko King". The proceeds will help pay legal fees that Mr Okada racked up during decades of feuding with Steve Wynn, a rival gambling tycoon.

Mr Wynn, a casino mogul, once collaborated with Mr Okada to build a gambling empire in Asia. But the pair fell out in 2012. Mr Wynn's company eventually paid more than $2.6bn to settle a lawsuit with Mr Okada's, but Mr Okada owed $50m in legal costs. The Sotheby's sale will help pay the debt.

And what a sale it was. Lots include a rare print of "The Great Wave" by Hokusai Katsushika, one of the world's most famous works of art. Yet even that is unlikely to wash away attention from the dramatic feud.

Photograph: Universal Pictures

The spellbinding success of “Wicked”

A two-part musical-movie extravaganza has struck a chord. Last year’s first instalment of “Wicked” took more than $750m at the global box office, surpassing “Mamma Mia!” (2008) to become the highest-grossing film adaptation of a Broadway musical. “Wicked For Good”, the second half of the tale about Glinda the Good Witch (Ariana Grande) and Elphaba, the Wicked Witch of the West (Cynthia Erivo), was released to much fanfare this week.

What explains the films’ success? It helps that they are adapted from an already popular stage show seen by 70m theatregoers around the world. And their cinematic wizardry makes the wonderful world of Oz seem, well, wonderful. “Wicked For Good”—a nearly two-and-a-half-hour film spun out of an hour-long musical act—offers new songs and silly phrases. Characters say “a clock tick” in place of “a second” and words like “obsessulated” with alarming frequency. This may leave some viewers feeling less than obsessulated with the whole thing.

Photograph: Shutterstock

Weekend profile: Erik Prince, America's most notorious mercenary

Fifteen years ago the future looked grey for Erik Prince. A string of scandals had forced the American executive to sell Blackwater, the private military company (PMC) he had founded in 1997. The war on terror—which had fuelled Blackwater’s rise—was being scaled back. Neo-cons were out; multilateralism was in. Dogged by lawsuits and negative headlines, Mr Prince left America for the United Arab Emirates. The age of the modern mercenary, in the West at least, was over.

Or so it seemed. Today, the industry’s rise appears unstoppable—and Mr Prince is back at the heart of it. From Ukraine to Haiti to Congo, America’s most notorious mercenary is everywhere.

The scion of wealthy Michigan industrialists, Mr Prince had a conservative upbringing. His father, whose factory made die-cast machines, was a big donor to organisations promoting traditional Christian values. The young Mr Prince joined the United States Naval Academy, but quit after three semesters reportedly because he found the place too liberal. He eventually became a Navy SEAL, serving in the Balkans, Haiti and Middle East (though he saw no combat). But two tragedies in short succession—the death of his father in 1995, followed by his first wife falling ill with cancer (she died in 2003)—prompted the 25-year-old to return home, whereupon he sold the family business for a reported $1.35bn.

With the proceeds he set up Blackwater, which thrived in Iraq after the American invasion in 2003—until it attracted criticism for the behaviour of its contractors. Four were convicted of killing 14 Iraqi civilians in a notorious massacre in Baghdad in 2007. He ostensibly retreated from the limelight, but controversies still followed. The UAE reportedly hired him to set up a battalion of 800 foreign mercenaries, at a time when autocracies across the Middle East were being buffeted by the Arab Spring.

As competition has heated up between China and America over control of critical minerals, Mr Prince has focused on Africa. Donald Trump has put Congo at the heart of his administration’s Africa policy, helping to mediate a fragile ceasefire in the country’s conflict-wracked east in return for a stake in its riches. Mr Prince, meanwhile, struck a deal to help the Congolese government collect taxes. He tells The Economist he is helping boost state capacity. Critics fear he will undermine it.

Unusually for a mercenary, Mr Prince is not media shy. He is brimming with the MAGA-style machismo that his friend Pete Hegseth, America’s Secretary of War, calls a “warrior ethos”. Last year he proposed a return to colonial rule in African and South American countries “incapable of governing themselves”.

The world according to Mr Prince is one in which private firms with private firepower are the solution to many of its most intractable problems. The choice in many places, he says, is between private companies bringing order, or “total anarchy, meltdown”.

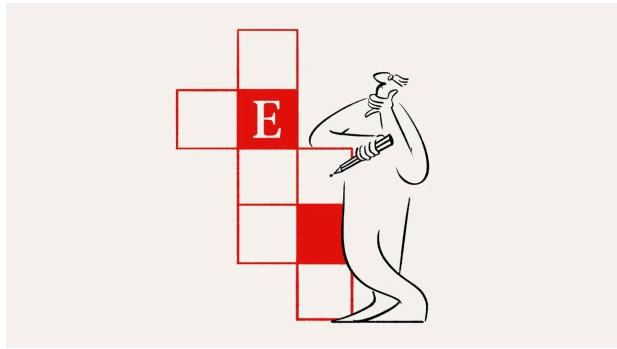

Illustration: The Economist

Mini crossword

We publish a new interactive edition of our crossword daily, allowing you to enter and check the answers and see explanations. Try it here.

There are two sets of clues, one for seasoned cruciverbalists and the other for less experienced solvers. Both give the same answers.

Cryptic clues

1 across - No good hint about an absence of anything (7)

2 across - Country in the bottom left-hand corner of paradise (6)

3 across - Births concealed by audio rig in studio (7)

1 down - Disturbed, unsocial or mad: Latin leader in trouble? (7,6)

Straight clues

1 across - What Donald Trump says Mohammad bin Salman knew about the killing of Jamal Khashoggi (7)

2 across - Country that in 2023 banned digital tools for young children (6)

3 across - What Nike had in the running tracks of Oregon in the 1960s (7)

1 down - Leader accused of directing the Cartel de las Soles (7,6)

Email all four answers, along with your home city and country, by 9am GMT on Monday to [\[email protected\]](mailto:). We will pick three winners at random and crown them in Tuesday's edition.

Illustration: The Economist

The winners of this week's quiz

Thank you to everyone who took part in this week's quiz. The winners, chosen at random, were:

Marco Radnic, Punta del Este, Uruguay

Amitai Wagner, Zikhron Ya'akov, Israel

Kathryn Voegeli, Uetikon am See, Switzerland

They all gave the correct answers of: a monk, Charlie's Angels, a clown, Cat Stevens and gold. The theme is types of fish: monkfish, angel fish, clownfish, catfish and goldfish.

The questions were:

Monday: A man who decided to become a Cistercian or Carthusian would have chosen what profession?

Tuesday: Farrah Fawcett, Kate Jackson and Jaclyn Smith were the original cast members of which TV show?

Wednesday: The childkiller in Stephen King's novel "It" usually appears in what form?

Thursday: The singer-songwriter Yusuf Islam is also known by which stage name?

Friday: White, rose and yellow are the most common colours for which precious metal when used in jewellery?

It is a narrow mind which cannot look at a subject from various points of view.

George Eliot