

World in Brief: Anthropic's reprieve; Donald Trump's crypto bonanza

America's Commerce Department lifted export controls on all of Anthropic's artificial-intelligence models. Last month officials ordered Anthropic to ban foreigners from gaining access to its latest Mythos and Fable models, citing safety concerns. The decision forced Anthropic to bar all users from those models. The firm says it has put in place "a new safeguard" to satisfy the Trump administration.

Donald Trump earned more than $1bn from his cryptocurrency ventures in 2025, according to a new disclosure. At least half that amount came from selling tokens that the family's crypto firm, World Liberty Financial, created. The president also raked in another $1bn or so from his other businesses, including his property empire. The White House said "neither the president nor his family has ever engaged—or will ever engage—in conflicts of interest".

Spain recorded more than 1,000 excess deaths linked to extreme heat in June. Temperatures rose to above 40°C (104°F) in the country during a five-day European heatwave last month, and were around 3.2°C higher than normal on average. Last week France also reported that more than 1,000 people had died because of the heat. The continent is warming faster than any other.

The EU introduced a €3 ($3.4) fee on low-value imports, ending a duty-free exemption for parcels valued under €150. The move targets Chinese e-commerce brands like Temu and Shein. Officials said that 5.8bn such parcels entered the bloc last year, up from 1.4bn in 2022. In 2025 America ended a similar exemption for packages worth less than $800.

Police in South Africa said they arrested more than 900 people at anti-migrant protests that swept the country on Tuesday. Vigilante groups had marked the day as a “deadline” for illegal immigrants to leave, which raised concerns about a possible spike in violence. Police said that most of the protests were peaceful, though some were accompanied by looting and other disruption.

Afghanistan launched strikes at targets in Pakistan. The attack followed Pakistani air strikes on Sunday, which the UN said killed at least 28 Afghan civilians. Russia urged the neighbours to resolve their differences through “diplomatic means”. The countries agreed to a ceasefire last year, but it didn’t last long.

Mr Trump took his first trip on a luxury jet given to America by Qatar. He accepted the Boeing 747 after complaining about the shabbiness of the existing Air Force One planes, prompting some lawmakers to complain that the Gulf country was seeking to buy influence. The president’s new toy has had a $400m refit, including a paint job similar to his personal jet.

Figure of the day: Six, the number of goals Lionel Messi and Kylian Mbappé have scored so far at the 2026 World Cup. Our Back Story columnist examines why this year’s tournament belongs to football’s superstars.

US in Brief: Born this way

The Supreme Court struck down Donald Trump's executive order to end birthright citizenship for babies born in America to undocumented or temporary migrants, declaring it unconstitutional. Mr Trump subsequently suggested, inaccurately, that he can "easily make it up in Congress through Legislation". (Such a law would face significant legal hurdles.) The president had better luck regarding state bans on transgender athletes competing in women's sport: all nine justices agreed they can be excluded under a federal civil-rights law. The conservative majority also relaxed restrictions on campaign spending.

Members of the House of Representatives headed home early after right-wing Republicans voted down a procedural motion, stalling the week's legislative agenda. Conservatives want Republican leaders to advance Mr Trump's save America Act, which seeks to end most mail-in ballots and to require voters to present proof of citizenship and photo identification, as well as a border-security bill. Separately, the House failed to pass a war-powers resolution that would have required Congress to approve any American involvement in Israeli military operations in Lebanon.

The progressive wing of the Democratic Party continued its winning streak. In Colorado's Democratic primary for governor,

Phil Weiser, the attorney-general, defeated Michael Bennet, a prominent senator (whose brother writes for The Economist), after casting Mr Bennet as a Washington insider—an upset that signals voter frustration with establishment figures. Meanwhile, Melat Kiros, a 29-year-old, defeated Diana DeGette, a 29-year incumbent, in the 1st District’s House primary. Manny Rutinel, a progressive state representative, also ousted Shannon Bird, a moderate former state representative, in the 8th.

The Food and Drug Administration allowed some Zyn nicotine pouches to be marketed to adults as safer than cigarettes, by claiming their use carries a lower risk of diseases including lung cancer and heart disease. The smoke-free products made by Philip Morris International, a tobacco giant, were authorised for sale last year. They are the first nicotine pouches to receive the designation.

Germany's coalition attempts a reboot

If you feel sorry for Germany's footballers, ejected from the World Cup by Paraguay on Monday, spare a thought for the country's politicians. A promised "autumn of reforms" last year fizzled out, Germany's economy remains stuck and its coalition, which unites Friedrich Merz's conservatives with the Social Democrats, has squabbled endlessly. On Wednesday senior figures from the ruling parties hope to reboot with a meeting designed to agree on tax, labour-market and other reforms.

Last week moods improved when the parties agreed that reforms to Germany's pension system, proposed by a state-backed commission, should be implemented in full. But the topics on Wednesday's agenda, especially how to fund tax cuts for low earners, could prove harder to solve. What was supposed to be a one-day session could drag on, possibly into Friday. Going to extra time, if that is what it takes, beats going home.

Bending Spoons lists for American IPO

Bending Spoons, a conglomerate based in Milan, will list its shares on America's tech-heavy Nasdaq exchange on Wednesday. The IPO values the company at around $18bn, in what would be a rare European-tech success story.

Bending Spoons buys ailing digital businesses at low prices and fixes them up. It has done so for around 50 companies since its founding in 2013, including Vimeo, a video platform, and WeTransfer, a file-sharing service. The firm's revenue comes from monthly subscriptions for its apps, and has grown from $387m in 2023 to $1.3bn in 2025. But a recent buying spree has loaded the firm with debt. And some of the older digital brands it forked out for are under threat from artificial intelligence. Bending Spoons says AI is actually an opportunity, noting improvements in its productivity and marketing. The firm's stock-market debut will show if investors are convinced.

Taking stock of the Supreme Court

America's Supreme Court wrapped up its term with mixed results for Donald Trump's agenda. It upheld state bans, favoured by the administration, on transgender athletes competing in women's sport: all nine justices agreed that biological males can be excluded from female sports under Title IX, a federal civil-rights law that bans sex discrimination in schools. All but three added that such bans do not violate the constitution. The conservative majority also relaxed restrictions on campaign spending.

The president was less thrilled about the court's 6-3 decision to strike down his executive order to end birthright citizenship for babies born in America to noncitizens. He wrote online, inaccurately, that he can "easily make it up in Congress through Legislation". Still, this defeat could not obscure the term's conservative bottom line: ruling in Trump v Slaughter on Monday, justices handed him more power by allowing him to fire commissioners of independent agencies at will. Mr Trump concluded that his party "was treated very fairly" by the court.

India revamps a big rural safety net

For two decades, the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act has been the cornerstone of India's rural-development strategy. The programme guarantees 100 days of minimum-wage employment on public works for every rural household that asks for it. Despite patchy implementation, the scheme had nearly 60m households participate in 2024-25. Studies show it is an effective safety net that also boosts rural incomes and empowers women.

On Wednesday MGNREGA was to be replaced by a new programme, known as VB-G RAM G, which India's government insists will improve on the old one by increasing the number of days of work available. Critics, however, say it is a downgrade that erodes its predecessor's legal guarantees. State governments will have to pay more than they are currently to fund the scheme; several are considering challenging the change in the Supreme Court. Meanwhile forecasters are predicting a historically weak monsoon in the coming weeks, which will strain rural livelihoods—and put the new programme to the test.

The lure of the rising sun

For the past two years the World Travel Index has deemed Japan the world's best destination. Last year a record 42.7m holiday-goers visited the country. But tourists may soon sense they are less welcome. From Wednesday Japan's government will raise the visa fee from ¥3,000 ($19) to ¥15,000 ($92)—the first increase in nearly 50 years.

The decision is a response to a souring mood. Overtourism has become a political issue, in part thanks to Sanseito, a small populist-right party. Viral clips of unruly visitors, like one of a tourist doing pull-ups on the sacred torii gate of a shrine, have provoked outrage. But the higher visa fee may not deter visitors. The lure of Japanese culture remains strong. The value of the yen has fallen to 162 to the dollar, a 40-year low. Holiday-makers will have to pay a bit more to enter Japan, but they'll save money while they're there.
