Donald Trump announced that, starting Monday, America would “guide” the ships of neutral countries out of the Strait of Hormuz. He said that any interference in the “Humanitarian gesture”—which he dubbed “Project Freedom”—would be met with force. He added that discussions with Iran continued and could lead to something “positive for all”.

Seven countries in OPEC+, a group comprising the oil-exporting cartel and its allies, said they would raise their oil-production target by 188,000 barrels a day in June. The increase is unlikely to be achieved, however, if the Strait of Hormuz remains shut. The announcement is a show of unity following the United Arab Emirates’ sudden departure from OPEC a few days ago.

More than 30 European leaders and Mark Carney, Canada’s prime minister, arrived in Armenia ahead of a summit. They will discuss how to strengthen their collective security amid a deepening rift between Mr Trump and Europe. Over the weekend America announced that it would withdraw 5,000 troops from Germany. Volodymyr Zelensky, Ukraine’s president, will also be at the meeting in Yerevan, Armenia’s capital.

Ukraine launched a drone attack on the Russian oil-loading port of Primorsk, on the Baltic Sea. Mr Zelensky said the strikes had damaged a missile ship, a patrol boat and an oil tanker. Ukraine has recently stepped up its attacks on Russian energy infrastructure. Primorsk is one of Russia's largest oil-export hubs, with capacity to handle 1m barrels of oil a day.

Three cruise-ship passengers died of suspected infections of hantavirus, a group of rodent-borne viruses that can cause respiratory illness in humans. In total, six people are believed to have been infected. They were among around 150 people on board the MV Hondius as it crossed the Atlantic Ocean. The World Health Organisation said that "detailed investigations are ongoing", but that one case has been confirmed as hantavirus.

Two American soldiers disappeared during a training exercise in Morocco. A Pentagon official said it appears to be an accident, and that the two men possibly fell off a cliff. American and allied forces, including the Moroccan army, are searching for the soldiers, who have not been seen since Saturday.

GameStop offered to buy eBay for around $56bn in cash and stock. The video-game retailer already owns a 5% stake in the e-commerce company. Ryan Cohen, GameStop's boss, said he wants to turn the online marketplace into "something worth hundreds of billions of dollars". If eBay turns down the proposal, Mr Cohen plans to take it to shareholders directly in a proxy fight.

Figure of the day: 130%, the amount by which eBay's share price has jumped since 2024. Read about the online marketplace's remarkable comeback.

Rising antisemitism in Britain

A series of violent antisemitic attacks has increased anxiety among British Jews to “another level”, Sir Keir Starmer, the prime minister, said over the weekend. On Wednesday two Jewish men were stabbed in Golders Green, a neighbourhood in the London borough that has the highest density of Britain’s roughly 300,000 Jews. Essa Suleiman, a 45-year-old man, has been charged with attempted murder. In recent months synagogues and vehicles belonging to a Jewish charity have been attacked too.

Sir Keir has pledged extra police funding and faster sentencing, but Jewish leaders worry antisemitism is being normalised as attitudes towards Israel sour. The thorniest question is how to curb hatred flowing through social media and anti-Israel protest marches without trampling free speech. A government review of public-order legislation, commissioned after a deadly attack on a synagogue in Manchester in October, is already months late. But Britain’s government will struggle to solve the root problem: legal measures rarely alter attitudes.

What next for German-American ties?

Last year Friedrich Merz reckoned negotiating with Donald Trump would be “very easy”. Not anymore. Last week Germany’s chancellor said that America “obviously has no strategy” for its war with Iran. Mr Trump retaliated swiftly on social media and in real life. On Friday the Pentagon announced plans to withdraw 5,000 of America’s 39,000 troops at German bases. Mr Trump claimed more would follow.

It could be merely bluster. A similar decision in Mr Trump’s first term was cancelled after being slow-rolled by Congress. What really worries German officials is America scrapping a deal made in 2024 to station American intermediate-range missiles in Germany. This agreement buys Europe time to build up its own deterrence after Russia installed nuclear-capable missiles in Kaliningrad, its exclave on the Baltic coast.

The spat broke out while Mr Merz’s position is more precarious than ever: his approval rating and coalition support are both disintegrating. With eastern state elections in September, Mr Merz may wish to revise his own strategy.

The BJP looks set to finally conquer West Bengal

Results began rolling in elections in four Indian states. Early counting suggests that two of them—Assam and West Bengal in the country's east—have been swept by the Bharatiya Janata Party. India's ruling party, however, struggled in the south. In Kerala a coalition led by Congress, the national opposition, is expected to topple the ruling communists. In Tamil Nadu a new party formed by Vijay, a film star, looks set to break a decades-long duopoly of regional parties.

For the BJP, any disappointment in the south looks set to be far outweighed by the joy of winning West Bengal. The Hindu-nationalist party had long struggled to make inroads there; Mamata Banerjee of the All India Trinamool Congress party has led the state for 15 years. Yet as the BJP celebrates what looks like a landmark win, questions swirl over the election process. The vote was preceded by a controversial revision of voter rolls that disqualified more than 9m voters (roughly 12% of the electorate). Opposition leaders alleged wrongdoing. Following the BJP's apparent landslide victory, expect those complaints to get louder.

Nigeria's rocky economic recovery

This week Stanbic IBTC Bank in Nigeria releases its monthly survey of private business activity—a useful proxy for growth at a time of uncertainty about the country's economic trajectory. Things had been looking up recently: painful reforms, including floating the currency and scrapping fuel subsidies—have slowly stabilised the economy since 2023. GDP and foreign reserves have risen; inflation is down.

But in December the finance minister, Wale Edun, burst the optimistic bubble by announcing that the government was set to miss its 2025 revenue target by approximately N30trn ($20bn) and had already borrowed heavily to fill in fiscal gaps. During his tenure Mr Edun repeatedly attempted to reduce the government's increasingly expensive debt burden (which gobbles up some 60% of revenues). In April, a cabinet reshuffle saw Mr Edun abruptly depart his post.

These woes have worsened by the turmoil in the gulf pushing up the prices of commodities and reversing inflation's downward trend. The government will want to regain the sense of progress before elections next year.

The Met Gala, sponsored by Jeff Bezos

On Monday New York’s richest and most famous will descend (very, very slowly) down the steps of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The Met Gala, fashion’s glitziest night, has run for almost 80 years, raising both funds for the museum’s costume institute—a record $31m last year—and web traffic, as fashionistas pore over their outrageous couture.

Since 1995 Anna Wintour, Vogue magazine’s grande dame, has handpicked the event’s attendees and its enigmatic theme. (Designers will no doubt find this year’s “fashion is art” far easier than the 2004 directive to draw on “furniture in the 18th century”.) No matter how obscure the attire is, the gala cannot escape politics. This year’s lead sponsors are Jeff Bezos, Amazon’s founder, and his wife Lauren Sánchez Bezos, leading protesters to call for boycotts over the billionaire’s chumminess with Donald Trump. Zohran Mamdani, New York’s leftist mayor, is breaking with precedent and skipping the event. Mr Bezos is unlikely to mind.
