

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: U.S. Navy photo

Israel announced that it killed the new leader of the armed wing of Hamas in an airstrike on Gaza. Despite having signed up to a ceasefire, the country has also stepped up its offensive against Hizbullah, an Iranian-backed militia, in southern and eastern Lebanon. The Israeli military claims to have struck more than 100 targets on Tuesday—at least 31 people were killed, including children.

Iran criticised American air strikes as a sign of “bad faith and unreliability” that violated the countries’ ceasefire. America would be responsible for “all consequences”, Iran’s foreign ministry asserted. America said it struck missile sites and mine-laying boats in self-defence. It is unclear how the attacks will affect peace talks currently taking place in Qatar, though reports suggest they are continuing.

Spain’s police raided the ruling Socialist Party’s headquarters in Madrid as part of an ongoing investigation into allegations of illegal financing. El País, a Spanish newspaper, reports that authorities are also investigating Gaspar Zarrías and Santos Cerdán, two notable party figures. These are the latest in a series of probes involving the party of Pedro Sánchez, Spain's increasingly unpopular prime minister.

Chinese industrial profits grew by 24.7% year on year in April, the biggest increase since November 2023. Higher oil prices have given a windfall to fuel producers; the artificial-intelligence boom has increased demand for electronics. But the oil shock and weak domestic demand have hurt other sectors, including the auto and solar-power industries.

Ken Paxton, Texas's attorney-general, won a primary to become the Republican candidate for a seat in America's Senate. Backed by Donald Trump, he defeated John Cornyn, the four-term incumbent. The outcome shows the president's hold over the Republican Party and gives Democrats hope of winning the seat in midterm elections in November. Mr Paxton, who has been at the centre of various scandals, looks beatable.

Unionised workers at Samsung Electronics approved a deal that guarantees employees in the firm's semiconductor division 10.5% of its operating profit. The deal was reached an hour before a planned 18-day strike. The AI bonanza drove the chipmaker's valuation to over $1trn this month. SK Hynix, a rival that agreed to similar incentives in April, crossed that threshold on Wednesday.

Alexis Tsipras, a left-wing firebrand and former prime minister of Greece, announced his return to politics with the launch of a new party. The Greek Left Alliance hopes to unify opposition to the centre-right government, which has helped invigorate Greece's once-moribund economy. Mr Tsipras accuses it of being "pro-business" which, he says, furthers inequality.

Figure of the day: $64trn. The value of companies' total offshore assets. Read about why tax havens are thriving despite crackdowns.

Photograph: Getty Images

America's mixed messaging

At times, Donald Trump seems to be negotiating with himself. After dropping heavy hints over the weekend of an imminent peace deal, America then dropped missiles on southern Iran on Monday. The combatants are still discussing an interim deal to extend their ceasefire and reopen the Strait of Hormuz. Iran's demand for immediate sanctions relief and the fate of its stockpile of highly-enriched uranium remain sticking points.

In one social-media post on Monday, Mr Trump seemed prepared to accept Iran's uranium being "destroyed in place", rather than his oft-repeated demand that it be shipped outside the country first. But another Trumpian missive urged Arab and Muslim-majority countries to recognise Israel at the end of the war. They will almost certainly decline to do so. The request was a sign of how poorly the emerging accord with Iran is viewed by hawkish Republicans: Mr Trump is desperate to sweeten the deal.

Photograph: Getty Images

Africa's Christian conservatives convene

Right-wing Christians from across Africa descend on Accra, Ghana's capital, this week for the "Pan-African Conference on Family Values". Delegates will discuss how to resist the alleged threats of secular liberalism. But the cross-denominational shindig—which was first held in 2023, and is sponsored by powerful conservative Christian groups from the West—is also a platform to promote a proposed "African charter" on family values. That includes curbing sex education in schools and limiting reproductive rights.

This conservative movement has gained momentum in recent years. Governments are becoming more receptive to their demands. In February 2025 Ghanaian lawmakers reintroduced a controversial anti-LGBTQ bill; in April, a Kenyan court struck down a ruling affirming the right to abortion. Though delegates in Accra will surely play up a sense of peril, these days their liberal rivals have more reason to worry.

Photograph: Getty Images

Britain and Poland find common ground

The British government, struggling domestically, has recently found some solace abroad. Since Labour assumed office in 2024, Britain has signed a new “strategic partnership” with Norway and agreements to “co-ordinate” nuclear weapons with France and increase defence co-operation with Germany. On Thursday, Sir Keir Starmer, the prime minister, is expected to add a new defence and security treaty with Poland to that list.

The two countries have similar outlooks on sanctions against Russia and support for Ukraine. They already signed smaller agreements, in 2017 and 2023, to boost collaboration in fields such as military training and cyber-security. The new pact will focus more specifically on economic resilience, energy security, illegal migration and crime, and foster greater co-operation between the two countries’ defence industries. It may only partially allay some other tensions, though. Poland worries that Britain’s tighter diplomacy with France and Germany could lead to its being sidelined from a post-war settlement in Ukraine.

Photograph: Reuters

Hong Kong airport's plan for a better tomorrow

Passengers flying from Hong Kong International Airport on Wednesday should double-check their destination before hopping into a cab: terminal two finally reopened, having closed in 2019 for refurbishment. Initially, it will house mostly budget and short-haul carriers.

The move is part of Hong Kong's plan to solidify its status as a regional air-transport hub. Over the past decade HKIA has reclaimed a patch of land the size of Gibraltar, revamped terminal one and added a third runway. The new terminal is meant to wow passengers, whose numbers are still down since the pandemic.

Still, tourists may count for less than cargo. Last year HKIA moved more than 5m tonnes, making it the world's busiest cargo airport for the 15th time since 2010. The renovations are also meant to help it shift more goods from mainland China to the rest of the world. With China's exports on the rise, that strategy will probably fly.

Super market

China, share of global exports, %

2014 2024

Sources: BACI; World Bank WITS; The Economist

Photograph: Alexander Hammer/Room to Move

A new documentary on dance and difference

“Room to Move” may appear to be about dance. It is really about neurodivergence. The acclaimed documentary, streaming on Netflix from Wednesday, follows Jenn Freeman, a choreographer in her 30s who is losing her connection to her lifelong passion when she is diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder. Though shaken, Ms Freeman is also given a new perspective on her life, allowing her to recognise her dancing as having originated in “stimming”—the repetitive self-stimulation through which many autistic people regulate anxiety or other intense emotions.

Alexander Hammer, the director, deploys an immersive style reminiscent of both “Moonage Daydream” and “Afternoons Of Solitude”—two recent documentaries about David Bowie and bullfighting, respectively. This helps the viewer experience Ms Freeman’s life as she does: seeing what she sees and feeling what she feels (at least a little). In doing so, it provides a rare insight into how a neurodivergent person understands the world.

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Wednesday: Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters were pioneers in which music genre?

Tuesday: Which architect designed the Guggenheim museum in New York?

The hottest places in hell are reserved for those who, in times of great moral crisis, maintain their neutrality

Dante Alighieri