

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: Reuters

The price of Brent crude, the global oil benchmark, soared past $125 a barrel—its highest level since 2022—before falling to around $114, as hopes of a swift end to the conflict evaporated. Donald Trump said he would maintain a naval blockade of Iran's ports until it agrees to curb its nuclear programme.

The Pentagon revealed that the war with Iran has cost America $25bn so far. At a hearing in Congress, Pete Hegseth, the secretary of war, said preventing Iran from getting a nuclear bomb is worth the money. He denied that the war had become “a quagmire” and lambasted the “defeatist words of congressional Democrats and some Republicans”.

America's economy grew at an annualised rate of 2% in the first quarter of 2026, slightly below the expectations of economists. On Wednesday the Federal Reserve held interest rates steady. Jerome Powell, in his last meeting as chair, warned of higher inflation because of the energy shock but said it was too soon to know the full extent of price rises.

Eli Lilly reported first-quarter revenues of $20bn, up 56% year on year. Boosted by its weight-loss drugs, the American drugmaker nearly tripled its profit to $7.4bn and raised its guidance for 2026.

Foundayo, Lilly's long-awaited weight-loss drug in pill form, was approved by American regulators earlier this month.

Taiwan's economy grew at its fastest pace in nearly four decades, largely fuelled by the AI boom which has increased demand for computer chips that the country makes. Taiwan's statistics bureau reported a 13.7% year-on-year increase in GDP in the first quarter. GDP expanded by around 2.8% during the quarter. Taiwan's economy was among the world's top performers last year, with GDP expanding by 8.7%.

An Australian commission on antisemitism, set up after a massacre last year at a Hanukkah celebration on Bondi beach, recommended that the government finalise a national gun-buyback scheme and bolster policing during Jewish holidays. Meanwhile, police declared a stabbing in north London, which seriously injured two Jewish men, a terrorist incident. Several antisemitic attacks have taken place in Britain recently.

Rémy Cointreau, a French spirit-maker, recorded its first annual revenue growth in three years. Full-year sales were €935.3m ($1.1bn), up 0.2% from the year before but below analysts expectations. Cognac sales jumped 16% in the fourth quarter but fell 0.5% over the full year. In November, its chief executive promised the "start of a new era" for Rémy.

Figure of the day: 12, the number of African countries expected to be among the world's 20 fastest-growing economies in 2026. Read the full story.

Photograph: Getty Images

Europe's opaque economic outlook

The European economy is difficult to predict at the best of times. It is even harder now. The global energy shock is dulling consumers' appetites and putting upward pressure on inflation, which hit 3% in the euro zone, according to preliminary figures published on Thursday. Inflation is forecast to reach 5% or more this year if oil prices stay above $100 a barrel.

New data show growth of just 0.1% in the first quarter. It's not obvious what will happen next. Recent business-activity data for services were dire, at post-pandemic-era lows, but those for industry were at a 47-month high. The European Central Bank subsequently left rates unchanged at its meeting on Thursday. But the bank was careful to stress that a possible increase in June remains on the table.

Illustration: David Simons

The Bank of England is playing a waiting game

Britain's central bank voted to keep its benchmark interest rate at 3.75% on Thursday. Before the war in the Gulf the Bank of England was cutting rates; it has done so six times since August 2024. In early February the bank projected that inflation would fall to around 2% (its target) in the second quarter of 2026, leading traders to expect further cuts. But because of soaring energy costs the bank now forecasts inflation reaching 3.5% by September.

Huw Pill, its chief economist, worried that this will cause wages and prices to push each other higher over a longer period. He voted for a pre-emptive interest-rate hike to 4% to prevent that. But the bank's eight other rate-setters—including Andrew Bailey, the governor—worried that a premature rise could weaken an already-fragile economy. They voted to hold, wanting the fog of war to clear a little before they alter rates.

Photograph: EPA

Iran's World Cup dilemma

More than 200 national football federations will attend the annual congress of FIFA, the game's global governing body, which starts in Vancouver on Thursday. The men's World Cup in America, Canada and Mexico, which kicks off in just six weeks, is sure to dominate discussions.

That will mean more political talk than usual—not least about Iran's participation. The country's sports minister, Ahmad Donyamali, has expressed concerns about security, linked to the war with America. "Our boys are not safe," he has said. Iran are due to play group-stage matches against Belgium and New Zealand in Los Angeles and against Egypt in Seattle. FIFA has dismissed requests to move the games to Mexico.

FIFA's president, Gianni Infantino, is eager to keep the ball rolling. He insists that Iran will take the field. But with five members of the Iranian women's team granted humanitarian visas after a tournament in Australia, security concerns may be the least of Tehran's worries.

Photograph: Propstore

Souvenirs of popstars past

Pop memorabilia is big business. Recently Christie's, a venerable auction house, sold a Fender Stratocaster played by David Gilmour, Pink Floyd's guitarist, for a record $14.5m. The "Treasures from Music" auction, which opens on Thursday in London, caters to (somewhat) smaller budgets. Propstore, the auctioneer, founded in 1998, is two centuries younger than Christie's. Its catalogue includes curios connected to Michael Jackson, Amy Winehouse, Oasis and Queen. The prices range from three to six figures.

Among the most expensive is an autographed Gibson Les Paul guitar used by Slash of Guns N' Roses, which could fetch £300,000 ($405,000). Other highlights include a fur coat that belonged to George Harrison, the Beatles' late lead guitarist; a proof print of "Aladdin Sane", David Bowie's lightning-flash album cover; and a leather jacket worn by George Michael in his "Faith" music video. From this century, a battered pair of Kendrick Lamar's Nike sneakers is listed for £20,000.

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Thursday: Which buildings in Malaysia were the world's tallest from 1998 to 2004?

Wednesday: The median appears at which point of a statistical distribution?

Work is the best of narcotics, providing the patient be strong enough to take it.

Beatrice Webb