Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Iran accused America of violating the ceasefire, claiming that America attacked one of its tankers in the Strait of Hormuz and struck “civilian areas” elsewhere. Explosions were reported in several cities, including Tehran. An American official said the strikes were “self-defence”. Iran had previously been considering an American proposal to end the war.

America’s Court of International Trade struck down Mr Trump’s 10% global tariffs. Mr Trump imposed the new levies in February after the Supreme Court blocked the bulk of his tariffs. He invoked Section 122, an untested provision from the 1970s, arguing that the duties were necessary to plug “balance of payments deficits”. However in a 2-1 ruling the federal judges disagreed with that argument.

The Economist has exclusively seen evidence of a secret Russian plan to supply innovative weapons to Iran to be used against American troops. The three-part proposal was prepared by the GRU, the intelligence arm of Russia’s armed forces. It posited sending two types of drones to Iran—including fibre-optic drones, which have transformed the battlefield in Ukraine—and providing training.

Mr Trump and Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, Brazil's president, discussed trade, tariffs and crime during a meeting at the White House. Despite frosty diplomacy between the leaders in the past, both reported that the conversation went well. Last year Mr Trump briefly imposed 50% tariffs on Brazil over its criminal case against his ally, former president Jair Bolsonaro.

McDonald's, one of the world's largest fast-food chains by revenue, posted better-than-expected quarterly results. Revenue grew by 9% year-on-year, rising to $6.52bn. But Chris Kempczinski, the American firm's boss, warned that high petrol prices, which squeeze low-income diners the hardest, could weaken consumer sentiment heading into the second quarter.

Two men were found guilty of spying for Hong Kong in Britain. London's top criminal court ruled that Bill Yuen, an office manager at Hong Kong's trade office in London, and Peter Wai, a British immigration officer, agreed to gather information to help the territory's foreign-intelligence service. The court also found them guilty of targeting pro-democracy activists.

The World Health Organisation confirmed five of the eight suspected cases of hantavirus on a cruise ship. Three passengers have died so far. An expert from the WHO said at a press conference that the rodent-borne virus was distinct from SARS-CoV-2 and that this was "not the start of a Covid pandemic". The boat is due to dock in the Canary Islands this weekend.

Figure of the day: 86, the number of social-media posts attacking the press published by Javier Milei, Argentina's president, over four days in April. He reposted another 874. Read about why Mr Milei is in serious trouble.

Iran weighs its options

America claims it is the closest it has been to a deal to end its war with Iran. But Donald Trump's track record has convinced Iran's leaders that diplomacy will not end the conflict. They are now asking whether to wait for American forces to attack or to attack first.

Immediately after the ceasefire began, advocates of patience seemed to be in the ascendant. The most prominent, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, a former commander of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps who is now speaker of parliament, was chief negotiator at talks with America in Islamabad. He is sympathetic to businessmen who counsel against escalation.

Yet Mr Qalibaf faces opposition—particularly from Ahmad Vahidi, a military man who believes Iran should resist America. If he prevails, escalation will follow. Strikes on tankers could resume, keeping the Strait of Hormuz closed and perhaps extending conflict to the Red Sea. And American warships and Gulf cities could come under more fire.

The sailors stranded in the strait

This week an American-flagged ship operated by Maersk, the world's second-biggest shipping company, was one of the first escorted through the Strait of Hormuz by America's navy since the war began. About 1,600 ships and 20,000 seafarers are stranded near the strait. Hopes of a reopening evaporated when Donald Trump paused his escort plan a day later.

Before the war Maersk moved about 40,000 containers in and out of the Gulf weekly. It has since suspended bookings in the region and imposed fuel surcharges elsewhere to offset the $500m monthly increase in costs because of the disruption. The Danish firm already faced losses because it had ordered too many vessels during a post-pandemic boom. On Thursday Maersk reported that its quarterly operating profit plunged by 73% year on year, mostly because of oversupply.

Even if Iran and America reach a deal, shipping lines should prepare for rougher sailing. The waterway is littered with Iranian mines. And nefarious actors near other chokepoints are wise to the leverage they can gain by threatening ships.

Checking in on Airbnb

Investors have recently given Airbnb decent reviews: its share price has risen by 16% over the past six months. The firm has added independent hotels to its platform and broadened its offering to include experiences such as walking tours. Analysts expect first-quarter results, released on Thursday, to show that revenue rose by 15% year on year to around $2.6bn.

This success has come despite growing political opposition. Like a stag party checking into a city-centre flat, Airbnb is not universally welcomed. Many cities have restricted holiday rentals, fearing they lift house prices and hurt hoteliers. America's Congress is investigating whether the company's use of Chinese artificial-intelligence models is a threat to national security.

More challenges are to come. Travel disruption caused by the Iran war and rising inflation are expected to hurt demand. Moreover, a hoped-for surge in North American bookings ahead of the football World Cup this summer is yet to materialise. As such, Airbnb's summer holidays look unusually perilous.

Britain's Labour Party faces a drubbing

On Thursday Britain's political parties face their biggest test before the next general election, which will probably be in 2029. Around two-thirds of Britain's electorate have the chance to vote in elections, including polls for parliaments in Wales and Scotland and local councils in much of England.

For the governing Labour Party the results are set to be especially painful. It could lose anywhere from 1,200 to 1,900 of the 2,200 council seats it is defending. The centre-left party could also lose control of the Welsh parliament, or Senedd, for the first time since the chamber was created in 1999. The populist-left Green Party hopes to make gains in Labour's urban strongholds, particularly in London; the populist-right Reform UK wants to displace Labour from its working-class heartlands in northern England. Disastrous results would pile pressure on the prime minister, Sir Keir Starmer—and perhaps set off a long-awaited leadership challenge.

LIV Golf looks for a lifeline

Donald Trump cannot stand a loser. But on Thursday the sad, failing LIV golf tour will visit the president's club near Washington, DC. It was launched five years ago to rival the stuffy PGA Tour and backed by more than $5bn from Saudi Arabia's Public Investment Fund. In 2022 Mr Trump encouraged PGA players to defect to the upstart and "take the money". A few days ago he changed his mind, suggesting that LIV players should instead rejoin the PGA because "All of the great golfers should be playing against each other."

LIV now looks like a fizzle. Golf fans have largely stuck with the PGA and some LIV players want to return. In April Saudi Arabia said it would stop funding it. The country is pulling back from flashy sports investments to focus on domestic spending in order to support flagging economic growth. The tour is looking for new investors, but it will be hard to get out of the rough.
