

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: U.S. Navy photo

Iran criticised American strikes as a sign of “bad faith and unreliability”. The country’s foreign ministry accused America of violating the ceasefire and warned that it would shoulder the blame for “all consequences”. America’s armed forces said they had struck missile sites in the south of the country and boats laying mines, in what they called an act of self defence, despite an “ongoing” ceasefire.

Iran began restoring internet access after an 88-day digital blackout that cost its economy an estimated $30m-40m each day. The move was announced following a vote by a task force set up by President Masoud Pezeshkian, a reformist who has vowed to ease censorship. The shutdown began during protests in January but intensified after the outbreak of war. It became the world’s longest recorded nationwide internet blackout.

The board of BP, a British oil giant, unanimously agreed to oust Albert Manifold, the firm’s chairman. It was in response to “serious concerns” about “governance standards, oversight and conduct”, according to a company statement. Mr Manifold had been in the role for less than a year, and survived a shareholder revolt last month. BP's shares fell by 8% following the announcement. Ian Tyler will take over in the interim.

Shares of Ferrari fell by 5% on Tuesday after the Italian luxury carmaker launched its first fully electric vehicle. The “Luce”, a sporty five-seater selling for €550,000 ($640,000), was developed in collaboration with Sir Jony Ive, a former Apple designer. Low demand and fierce Chinese competition has recently seen competitors like Lamborghini and Porsche scale back their EV plans.

North Korea fired missiles and rockets towards the Yellow Sea, according to South Korea's army. The country's first launch since mid-April coincided with a rare visit by Singapore's foreign minister. Xi Jinping, China's leader, may also visit North Korea in the coming weeks, according to South Korean media.

Micron, America's largest memory chipmaker, topped $1trn in market value for the first time. Its value surged by 18% after UBS, a bank, tripled its estimate for what the firm's share price will rise to over the next 12 months. Samsung Electronics and SK Hynix, Micron's largest rivals, also recently hit record valuations as the AI boom spurs demand.

A heatwave in Europe broke temperature records and left around a dozen people dead. Temperatures hit 35.1°C in London, eclipsing the 34.8°C record set a day prior which exceeded the standing May record from 1944 by 2°C, according to Britain's Met Office. France and Ireland also logged their warmest May day on record. Temperatures in parts of Spain are expected to soar to highs of 40°C this week.

Figure of the day: 74. The age of Jean-Luc Mélenchon. Read about the new political crush of France's Gen Zs.

Photograph: Getty Images

The Quad meets in Delhi

On Tuesday the foreign ministers of America, India, Japan and Australia gathered in India's capital to revisit a difficult question: how to counter China's growing influence in the Indo-Pacific? For the last decade, the four members of the Quad have come up with various answers. These have included building interoperable naval and communications systems, improving disaster-relief preparedness, and breaking China's stranglehold on critical minerals and emerging technologies.

But the Quad now faces another challenge: how to draw Donald Trump's attention. America's president revived the Indo-Pacific security outfit in his first term. But these days, he seems more interested in chasing Chinese business deals than checking China's military rise. The ministers will need to make a better case for their coalition. In the best-case scenario, America's Indo-Pacific allies will hope to lure Mr Trump to Delhi for a leader-level summit of the Quad by the end of this year.

Photograph: Reuters

America's red star votes

Republicans in Texas will vote on Tuesday in a long-awaited primary runoff to choose their Senate candidate for November. The election caps one of the nastiest and most expensive intraparty fights in state history. John Cornyn, the incumbent, has spent the better part of a year desperately defending his seat against Ken Paxton (pictured), the insurgent attorney-general who clinched Donald Trump's endorsement just last week.

The stakes reach far beyond Texas. There are familiar themes underlying the runoff—a test of the president's hold on the party and of the base's willingness to jettison experienced lawmakers for MAGA warriors. But many Republicans fear that Mr Paxton's legal troubles—for which his own party unsuccessfully impeached him—make him a weaker candidate to challenge James Talarico, the Democratic nominee, who has become a prolific fundraiser. In a close election year, control of the Senate could hinge on America's biggest red state.

Photograph: Reuters

Is Senegal headed for another political crisis?

As the resignations roll in, Senegal's political crisis is deepening. On Sunday the speaker of parliament resigned—just two days after the firebrand prime minister was fired. (A new premier, technocrat Ahmadou Al Amine Lo, was announced late on Monday). On Tuesday that ejected firebrand, Ousmane Sonko (pictured), emerged as the new speaker, winning 132 out of 133 votes. That will enable him to keep wielding his party's large parliamentary majority to influence politics. At a party conference on June 6th and local elections in November, he will probably cement his grip even further.

The rupture follows months of tensions and disagreements on tackling the country's ballooning debt. The IMF halted Senegal's programme in 2024, in response to miscalculated debt figures under the previous administration, and the economy has stalled since. In April the fund cut Senegal's GDP-growth forecast to 2.2%. While Mr Sonko rejected IMF proposals as offensive to Senegal's dignity, his departure could finally enable a more pragmatic Mr Faye to push on.

Photograph: Getty Images

Muslims make peace with a pricey hajj

In recent months the Gulf has become a risky travel destination as Iran has showered it with missiles and drones. Disruptions have also made travel to the region more expensive. Yet this week around 1.7m Muslims (slightly more than last year) are nonetheless expected to take part in the hajj, the annual Islamic pilgrimage to Mecca in Saudi Arabia this week.

Demand for the hajj remains high because it is one of the five “pillars” of Islam. The Koran instructs all Muslims to complete it once if they are financially and physically able. Some countries, such as Malaysia and Indonesia, always easily use up an annual quota of visas granted by Saudi Arabia, the host. Around 5.7m Indonesians are on a waiting-list. Some wait 40 years to be selected. If they are still alive when their turn comes, they are unlikely to decline it.

Photograph: Getty Images

The day of the jackal

In the Middle Ages the grey wolf ruled Europe, gobbling up sheep (and people). Wolves kept other canids at bay—the golden jackal, for example, was confined to slivers of coast in southeastern Europe. But over time humans, like Charlemagne’s luparii, learned to repel this lupine apex predator.

Europe’s wild canids are in flux again. A new study published this week in Nature Ecology & Evolution predicts that jackals will soon occupy three-quarters of the continent—six times their current range. Researchers played recordings of jackals howling at 8,991 locations across Europe between 2001 and 2017 to measure where the animals were (nearby jackals howled back). Even though wolves (the strongest constraint on jackals) are recovering, the study found that they may only reduce jackals’ range by 18%. That is because jackals’ proximity to humans now protects them from wolves (which avoid people). The jackal’s rise shows how humans change relationships between animals. This will change ecosystems: these small predators scavenge carcasses, control rodents and, like wolves, eat livestock.

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

Daily quiz

We will serve you a new question each weekday. On Friday your challenge is to give us all five answers and tell us the theme. Email your responses (and your home city and country) by 1700 BST on Friday to [\[email protected\]](#). We'll pick three winners at random and crown them on Saturday.

Tuesday: Which architect designed the Guggenheim museum in New York?

Monday: Which Republican Senator from Virginia was married to Elizabeth Taylor?

If my heart isn't in my mouth it's because it knows its place.

Phyllis Gotlieb