

The world in brief

Catch up quickly on the global stories that matter

Photograph: AFP via Getty Images

Donald Trump wrote on social media that a peace deal with Iran was scheduled to be signed on Sunday. He claimed that the agreement would open the Strait of Hormuz “to all” and put an end to Iran’s attempts to buy or develop nuclear weapons. Iran’s Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps said that the details had “not yet been finalised” and that the signing was “definitely not happening” on Sunday.

Britain’s resident doctors called off their planned strike next week, after the government tabled a new pay offer. It would have been the 16th time the medics, previously known as junior doctors, had walked out since 2023 over pay and staffing levels. The government reportedly did not offer extra money this year, but promised faster pay rises in the future.

Anthropic said it would disable its Fable 5 and Mythos 5 models for all users, after the Trump administration ordered it to prevent foreign nationals from using them. The White House edict covered foreigners “inside or outside the United States” and included Anthropic’s own foreign employees. The AI lab said the government cited national-security concerns. Anthropic has expressed worries that its powerful new models could be exploited by hackers.

Hungary's populist-right Fidesz party re-elected Viktor Orban as its leader despite his defeat in April's general election. Facing no challenger, the former prime minister won another one-year term with the support of 729 of 737 delegates. Speaking to supporters, Mr Orban took responsibility for "strategic mistakes" and announced an organisational overhaul of the party he has led since 2010.

Protesters in Albania tore down metal fencing and clashed with police at the site of a luxury development on the Adriatic coast, claiming it was being built on their confiscated land. The unrest follows a fortnight of anti-government demonstrations—among the largest in decades—over plans for a separate resort in an environmentally sensitive area by a company linked to Jared Kushner, Mr Trump's son-in-law.

It's curtains for "The Donald J. Trump and the John F. Kennedy Memorial Centre for the Performing Arts". Workers in Washington started removing the current president's name from the venue's facade, belatedly complying with a court ruling. Last month a district judge found that Mr Trump's hand-picked board of trustees lacked the authority to rename the institution in December without congressional approval.

The New York Knicks won their first National Basketball Association championship for 53 years. They beat the San Antonio Spurs 94-90 in San Antonio, their fourth win in the best-of-seven series. Joyous New Yorkers poured onto the streets to celebrate. Meanwhile in the football World Cup, Brazil and Morocco played out a 1-1 draw, while Scotland beat Haiti 1-0. Australia caused an upset by beating Turkey.

Word of the week: SaaSpocalypse, the widespread ruin that many fear AI will bring to the software-as-a-service industry. But will it?

Photograph: Getty Images

Donald Trump's birthday bash

Thirty years ago the Ultimate Fighting Championship, a mixed-martial-arts promotion, was practically illegal across much of America. States banned its events; John McCain, then a senator, called it “human cockfighting”. How times have changed. On Sunday the UFC will hold a fight night outside the White House to mark Donald Trump's 80th birthday.

The partnership between the UFC's boss, Dana White, and the president goes back decades. At first it was all business. Mr Trump welcomed the UFC at his Atlantic City casino when few others would. Then it turned political. Their alliance bolstered Mr Trump's transgressive, cartoonishly masculine image and helped him court the “bro” vote in the 2024 election. Now who can tell the difference between politics and business? The fight cage at the White House is plastered in ad copy. And on Saturday the Trump-aligned “super PAC” held a $1m-a-head fundraiser at the president's golf club in Virginia—ostensibly an independent event, though one with overlapping guest lists.

Photograph: Getty Images

Danger in the Horn of Africa

Abdel-Fattah al-Sisi, Egypt's strongman, recently held talks in Cairo with Isaias Afwerki, Eritrea's dictator. Since 2024 the pair have met at least four times, a budding bromance forged in fear. Mr Isaias worries that Ethiopia's leader, Abiy Ahmed, has expansionist designs on parts of his territory. He has cunningly made friends with the many enemies of his enemy. These include Mr Sisi, whose government says an Ethiopian mega-dam on the Nile poses an "existential" threat to Egypt's water supply, and the Tigray People's Liberation Front, a heavily armed group that rules Tigray, Ethiopia's northernmost region.

Ethiopia is rattled. On Tuesday a government mouthpiece said the TPLF and Eritrea were "Pharaoh's horses riding to tighten Egypt's yoke of destruction upon Ethiopia". And on Thursday Ethiopia's top spy warned that the TPLF, "aided and abetted" by Eritrea, planned to launch a war against the government "in the coming days". Mr Isaias's long-awaited showdown with Mr Abiy seems dangerously close at hand.

Image: The Economist

Photograph: Reuters

Europe's fighter-jet dilemmas

Last week Germany and France abandoned their effort, alongside Spain, to build a next-generation fighter jet. Officials could not resolve a dispute between French and German defence firms over how to share the work. Germany is now considering alternative options. One might be to join the Global Combat Air Programme, a rival jet project shared between Britain, Italy and Japan. It aims to launch its plane, known as the Tempest in Britain, by 2035.

GCAP does not suffer from the industrial bickering that scuppered Germany's collaboration with France. But it has problems of its own. Britain's government has so far been unable to commit to a long-term joint contract for the project as it struggles to raise defence spending. That frustrates Japanese officials. Japan's prime minister, Takaichi Sanae, is expected to visit London on Sunday to discuss the matter with her beleaguered British counterpart, Sir Keir Starmer. The prospect of attracting German investment in their jet set no doubt appeals.

Photograph: Getty Images

Switzerland considers a population cap

Switzerland holds a referendum on Sunday on a proposal to cap the population at 10m. The vote was triggered by an initiative by the populist-right Swiss People's Party, which gathered enough signatures to force a nationwide ballot. If voters back the proposal, the government would have to start reducing net migration once the population reaches 9.5m. Were those measures to fail, and the population to rise to 10m—currently expected sometime around 2040—Switzerland would be required to take stronger action, for example by terminating its agreement with the European Union on the free movement of people.

The SVP has tapped into concerns about Dichtestress (density stress), including rising housing costs and crime. Business leaders, the government and parliament oppose the proposal. They argue that a population cap would exacerbate labour shortages, cause economic stagnation and put pressure on the social-security system. And they warn that it could jeopardise Switzerland's access to the EU single market, its largest export market.

Photograph: Getty Images

Weekend profile: Aiko, the princess barred from the Japanese throne

At New Year Emperor Naruhito and his family stepped onto a balcony at the Imperial Palace in Tokyo. Thousands of well-wishers waved Japanese flags and cheered. But it was 24-year-old Aiko, or Princess Toshi, who made the crowd swoon. As if awaiting a pop idol, some held fans emblazoned with her name.

Aiko is the emperor's only child. But she can never inherit the throne: succession is restricted to men and only passes through the male line. When she marries, Aiko will leave the imperial family and become a commoner.

That is a problem for the family. Japan's monarchy, the world's oldest, is running out of heirs. In recent decades royal men have fathered several girls but only one boy: 19-year-old Prince Hisahito, Naruhito's nephew. If he does not father a son, the 2,700-year-old imperial line will die out.

Aiko's popularity has encouraged more Japanese to think that should change. From a young age she showed public-spiritedness. As a schoolgirl she wrote a story about a nurse who heals injured animals. After college she worked for the Red Cross. Her public appearances have impressed people, too; during her first official overseas visit, to Laos in 2025, she clung to a toy elephant a sick child had given her, refusing to pass it to an aide. And many Japanese regret the intense scrutiny her mother, Masako, faced for failing to produce an heir.

Japan's politicians are acutely aware. On June 10th leaders from the main political parties approved a proposal to amend the Imperial House Law to allow female royals to remain in the family after marriage. It would also enable royals to adopt children from imperial branch families that were stripped of royal status following the second world war (though they will not have succession rights). But the changes will still not let women rule.

Polls suggest that 90% of Japanese support a female emperor. Last year the country elected its first female prime minister, Takaichi Sanae. And there is even a comic-book series that argues for Aiko to become monarch. But Japan is still ranked 27th of 29 countries in The Economist's glass-ceiling index, which measures how women fare in the workplace. It may be a while yet before a woman sits on the Chrysanthemum Throne.

Illustration: The Economist

Mini crossword

We publish a new interactive edition of our crossword daily, allowing you to enter and check the answers and see explanations. Try it here. Or, if you prefer, use the clues below.

There are two sets of clues, one for seasoned cruciverbalists and the other for less experienced solvers. Both give the same answers.

Cryptic clues

1 across - South-west makes way for HR in sorrow, disgust (6)

2 across - Voyage the first time roads are vacant, evading lawlessness (6)

3 across - Hesitation after abnormal baby prattle (6)

1 down - Out of place, I spit at holy, warm reception (11)

Straight clues

1 across - _ show, _ film, _ -struck – scary! (6)

2 across - It usually requires many steps, but in basketball it only needs two or three (6)

3 across - Australian chatter (6)

1 down - The Greek concept “Xenia” that Zeus loved to test on humans (11)

Illustration: Sandra Navarro

The winners of this week's quiz

Thank you to everyone who took part in this week's quiz. The winners, chosen at random, were:

Cheryl Bernhardt, Calgary, Canada

Lungile Thabo Twalo, Johannesburg, South Africa

Kathryn Voegeli, Uetikon am See, Switzerland

They gave the correct answers of Monterrey, Vancouver, Philadelphia, Guadalajara and Atlanta. The theme is they are all venues for the 2026 football World Cup.

The questions were

Monday: What is the capital of the Mexican state of Nuevo León?

Tuesday: Stanley Park is a large public park in which North American city?

Wednesday: The First Continental Congress met in 1774 in which city?

Thursday: What is the capital of the Mexican state of Jalisco?

Friday: Which American city has the busiest airport in the world, in terms of passenger traffic?

No intelligent idea can gain general acceptance unless some stupidity is mixed in with it.

Fernando Pessoa